Latifah (the name is arabic for delicate and sensitive) crowned herself "not to denote rank, but to acknowledge that all Black people come from a long line of kings and queens that they've never really known about. This is my way of giving tribute to them," she said.

Queen Latifah's rhymes are rarely frivolous, although she never fails to remind you it's "Queen L-A-T-I-F-A-H in command." Her themes are global, racial and sexual. She is a strong woman, an excellent role model for a rap world that largely ignores, objectifies and/or berates women in both song and video. With cuts like "Fly Girl" and "Latifah's Had it Up to Here," she joins the cause of making all the boys stand up and take notice of the undeniable word — you don't funk with the Queen.

With her Afrocentric style and her powerful feminine persona, Latifah has been lifted to the level of rap guru, aligning herself with the likes of Public Enemy and doing her best to make changes in her world through her rap. "Nuff of the Ruff Stuff" sums it up as Latifah raps "The particular name of this Queen is Latifah / I've been classified as a feminine teacher / collectively capture the heart of a nation / love my culture and show appreciation."

There'll be much appreciation when the Queen of Royal Badness returns.

Queen Latifah will be appearing at Pearl St. in Northampton on Sunday, March 1 at 7 p.m. This is an 18+ show.

Magic Triangle Jazz plays on UMass radio

WMUA 91.1 FM, in its continued support of "jazz" music, begins its third annual Magic Triangle Jazz Concert Series this week with a performance by the Ed Blackwell Trio. This year's series remains true to form, with three concerts, spread over the next three months, on Thursday nights in the intimate Hampden Theatre. In its previous two years the series has brought some fine drummers, including Roy Haynes and Pete "LaRoca" Sims, but this concert marks the first time a percussionist has brought their own group.

JAZZ SCENE

Blackwell is one of the foremost drummers of his day, and is filled with an equal amount of history. He was born in 1929 in New Orleans, and at an early age came under the influence of drumming legends Paul Barbarin and Baby Dodds. In the early 1950s, while playing with Ellis Marsalis, Blackwell was heard by Ornette Coleman, who invited him to come out West. Blackwell accepted, spending time in California and Texas before returning to his native town.

After being jailed for miscegenation, Blackwell left New Orleans for New York where he replaced the great Billy Higgins in Coleman's group in 1960. While spending much of his time with Coleman, Blackwell played and recorded with John Coltrane, Don Cherry, Eric Dolphy, Mal Waldren, Booker Little, Randy Weston and others.

In 1975, Blackwell became artist-in-residence at Wesleyan University, after which he co-founded the group Old and New Dreams with Charlie Haden, Don Cherry and Dewey Redman. Blackwell currently fronts his own Ed Blackwell Project with Mark Helias and Carlos Ward, as well as continuing his associations with Mal Waldron and Old and New Dreams.

Blackwell uses a combination of gongs with his bass and tom-tom drums to create a melodic, sing-song-like sound. His uncanny melodicism has been augmented by his introduction of compelling African and Asian rhythms into his music which has provided an inspiration to countless numbers of other drummers.

While the concert series has had a tradition of superb drummers, it has also brought some heavy tenor players, including Clifford Jordan and Ricky Ford. This year also continues that trend, as Dewey Redman joins his long time compatriot Blackwell, along with bassist Cameron Brown.

Redman, a Texas native, has seen stints with Charlie Haden's Liberation Music Orchestra, Ornette Coleman and Keith Jarrett. His "gut-bucket blues" play is unparalleled, and his free improvisations are equally impressive. Redman's latest recorded endeavor is entitled "Living on the Edge" on Black Saint records.

Cameron Brown's bass has been tapped by Charlie Rouse, Zoot Sims, Chet Baker, Archie Shepp and Art Blakey. Yet he remains best known for his work with the George Adams-Don Pullen Quartet where he joined Dannie Richmond (Charles Mingus' lifelong drummer) in the rhythm section.

Pianoless trios are often intriguing, particularly when led by a legend such as Blackwell. In addition, seeing a master percussionist live is always much more of an auditory experience than merely listening to recordings. If you're a "jazz" fan, you can't miss this show, and if you're not too knowledgable about "jazz", then the Ed Blackwell trio is an excellent place to start.

The Ed Blackwell Trio will be in performance Thursday, Feb. 27, at 8 p.m. in Hampden Theatre. Tickets are an unbelievably low $7/$5 for 5-College students. Call 545-2511 for tickets, or purchase them at the door the night of the show.

NRBQ is 'fun fun fun' and a whole lot more!

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

If NRBQ was a video game, it would be "Toobin'." If NRBQ was a summer sport, it would be ultimate frisbee. If NRBQ was a band, they would be NRBQ. Oh, I guess they are a band. That would make them nothing but fun, fun, fun.

NRBQ (short for New Rhythm and Blues Quartet) are fast-moving fun from start to finish. They chum out fast rocking songs one after another, selected on the spot with little delay. Most songs they play contain some type of solo from guitarist Al Anderson, who is quite a talented musician. His presence on stage is also something to behold — a very big man, especially standing next to bassist Joey Spampinato.

Actually, the entire band is as fun to watch as to listen to. Spampinato looks like British comedian Christopher Ryan playing the character Neil on a classic episode of the Young Ones (if you are confused, just imagine a short man whose long straight hair almost touches the floor). Playing keyboards, Terry Adams looks sort of like Kevin Bacon with a Rod Stewart haircut. Drummer Tom Ardolino sits in the back, waving his big, frizzy hair in the breeze of the stage fan, looking much like a creation of Jim Henson.

Looks are nice. Looks are helpful. But I would not be writing this favorable preview if it were not for NRBQ's keen ability to rock any room from the start of a set clear through the end. They have no set list and they do not waste much time between songs. Their fuel is excitement — you can see them feed off their own momentum.

NRBQ's songs are usually void of any serious deep message. There is a song in their repertoire about restaurant monopolies along the MassPike, but, besides some semi-serious love songs, I am hard-pressed to recall imploring or preaching lyrics. Titles like "Me and the boys," "Ridin' in My Car" and "That's Alright" show their tendency to sing about plain old fun. Their love songs have the NRBQ fun touch to them. In "Magnet," Spampinato sings, "You're like a magnet/I'm like a piece of wood," making light of lost feelings. In "Feel You Around Me" Adams has deadened the piano with a coat, making a sound sort of like a toy piano.

NRBQ has been around for over 20 years, never really making commercial sucess. They are better known in the inner circles of the music world, though. Spampinato appears in a song on the recently released Eric Clapton LP 24 Nights. "Me and the Boys" has been recorded by Bonnie Raitt and Dave Edmunds. Raitt has also recorded NRBQ's "Green Lights."

An evening with NRBQ is on evening well spent. Do your best to get to Pearl Street Saturday night, and don't be surprised by a semi-large turnout of loyal fans, clad in t-shirts which read "Here comes Terry, here comes Joey, here comes Tom, here comes Al." And get a drink before the show starts, because there will be little chance to do so afterwards unless you want to miss the action.

Tong's disturbed Sky

By ANN MARINI
Collegian Correspondent

Red Sky at Morning
Mixed Media Exhibit
Hampden Gallery

Red Sky at Morning is now showing through March 8 at Hampden Gallery in Southwest residential area at the University of Massachusetts.

Sky is a small, mixed media exhibit by Michael Tong, a graduate student enrolled in the Master of Fine Arts program at UMass.

Through his work, Tong deals with the struggle of many Asian Americans and conveys how the experiences of his early youth in Communist China helped determine the individual he has become. So do not expect a pleasant, relaxing visit to an art gallery. His work will disturb you.

It will make you think.

The exhibit focuses on a particularly disturbing experience in the artist's life — the disturbance of Tong's grandfather's grave. Tong presents the viewer with an imposing vision: an oversized, metal representation of an open coffin contained by a cage, the height of which almost reaches the ceiling. Inside, a series of black and white photographs illustrate the traumatic event, communicating Tong's feelings of fear and isolation.

Tong, who spent the first 14 years of his life in Communist China, writes, "There are those experiences in life which are most important to our development. They help us create our self identity, to make us who we are.

"The first fourteen years of my life played a major role in the shaping of who I am today," Tong said.

Yet Tong reveals his formative experiences in a manner that enables a viewer to gain a sense of a child's perception of life in Communist China. What seems unimaginable for many is offered by Tong on a vulnerable, human level.

The Hampden Gallery is open Monday through Friday, 3-7 p.m., and Sunday, 2-5 p.m.

Variety of Modern dance

Hampshire dancers move inventively

By LISA LAMADELEINE
Collegian Correspondent

The Winter Dance Concert at Hampshire College last weekend provided a sampling of modern dance choreography. Modern dance, born in America at the turn of the century, sought natural, expressive, basic movement. Choreographers of this form are often inspired by emotions, universal ideas or the pure visual effect of motion. All of these styles were displayed at Hampshire through inventive movement.

"Vespers" began the performance with oppressive religious implications, established by the monk-like hooded costumes, the intense scores of Chopin and Paganini, and exploratory movement. Ed Groff created symbols of the crucifix and suffering throughout his seemingly "idea-inspired" choreography. The effective dancers struggled between expression and suffering with pulling and supporting gestures.

"Blessing," which followed, set to the natural sounds of breath, had a refreshing taste amongst the other conflict-laden works. The synchronized movement and sound reassured the audience with ideas of love and togetherness. The dancers added serenity to Erica Markin's natural choreography.

"Poisoned Rose," a solo choreographed and performed by Emily Park to Elvis Costello's song of the same title, resurrected the dead from "Vespers." Stifled expression was conveyed in this piece through the struggle between forced ballet-like poses and natural contractions and falls.

Amy Shuck's dark choreography, ironically titles "Night Light" filled the studio with desire. Emotions dominated the piece with reaching motions, and poignant music from Peter Buffet.

A surprisingly different style of choreography moved onto the stage in the second half of the program. Rebecca Nordstom's "One Perfect Rose," blossomed from poems by Dorothy Parker of the mid 1900s. Nordstom, with the combined talents of an actress and a dancer, embodies a writer who longed for inspiration. Parkers' prose, which played through the studio, revealed these feelings of being "sick and tired," and amused the audience with simple conclusions. "Just Live" was the writer's advice. The dramatic music arranged by Paul Ascenzo was performed live with Alan Bumsteed. The fervor of the music and prose materialized in Nordstrom's dramatics.

Struggle emerged again in Danica Phelp's work of homosexuality, "Direct and Other Derivatives." Continuous fall and recovery simulated the difficult relationship. Heartfelt supporting actions followed the initial pushing movements of suppression. Backing away from the center, the dancers Phelps and Julie Hoehnan were able to embrace.

The comedy of "One Perfect Rose" spouted again and grew funnier in the next work, "What's Your Sign?" Choreographers Dylan Star Berkey and Emily Park sppofed on the sterotypical "heaviness" of modern dance. The tunes from such greats as the Bee Gees and the Village People and dances from a "discomaniac" were interspersed between struggling contortions by the other two dancers. The disco-maniac dazzled the audience with her rendition of Saturday Night Fever and her seventies costume of designer jeans and a flashy gold headband.

The laughter stopped only for the concluding piece, "Three Grabs is All You Get." The three choreographers who also performed the work created incredible moving shapes to the sound of synthesized cries of children. Harding, Pengelly and Rabidoux explored floor movement, forming inhuman, modern art-like sculptures. The receptive audience was left with visual images of these agile dancers and a memorable night of drama, comedy and, of course, dance.

King is crawling out

By SAAD HOPKINS
Collegian Staff

King Missile (formerly King Missile Dog Fly Religion) is one of those bands that is easy to define musically, but are unique nonetheless. They're loud, yet "pop-y," subversive yet harmless, ugly and yet appealing on the stage. King Missile is one of the strangest bands to crawl out of the woodwork in recent memory.

Half newly written songs, and half re-writes of old songs resulted in their debut LP "Mystical Shit." That platter went on to be a fave not only with the critics, but also

PE's Souljah celebrates African History Month

By BONITA PATRICKS
Collegian Correspondent

In a lecture at Hampshire College last Thursday the African woman known as Sister Souljah spoke her peace in celebration of African-American History Month.

Souljah, most noted for her association with hardcore rap activists Public Enemy, is the voice behind the emotive and blood-curdling "WE ARE AT WAR," on the hit single "Buck Whylin" by Public Enemy's DJ Terminator X. She can also be seen in the PE video "Brothers Gonna Work it Out," where she played a reporter, and in 1990 Souljah played a cameo role in PE's controversial video "Can't Truss It." Her latest accreditations include guest vocalist on the 1991 Public Enemy release entitled Apocalypse '91...the Enemy Strikes Black, and the accompanying full-length home video, Tour of A Black Planet.

However, Souljah has branched out on her own and has recorded her debut album, 360 Degrees of Power, recently released on Epic Records. 360 Degrees of Power, a unique collection of ferocious raps and rhymes about police brutality, genocide, rape, sisterhood and global politics reflect her native Harlem experience and her messages to Africans across the world.

Sister Souljah's message, heard loud and clear in Franklin Patterson Hall, at a lecture sponsored by the Hampshire College Multicultural Center, was one of strong and willful sincerity, urging the African community to strengthen itself and its people from within.

Souljah explained that she holds certain definitions about who she is as a strong and powerful African woman.

"I have a lot of different messages. The strongest is to African women — to understand who we are. To develop definitions of ourselves that are rooted in our history as opposed to inherited through the American media," Souljah said.

"[We need] to divorce ourselves from the ways of other people who want to define our reality. To understand that we, as African women, have the potential to do anything. . . we come from a legacy of strength and we come from a legacy of fighters," says Souljah.

Souljah, who calls herself a raptivist, was educated in the advanced placement program at Cornell University, as well as the University of Salamanca (Spain) where she majored in history and African studies.

Souljah believes that all people of color are Africans, decendents of Africa, and that each African man and each African woman represent the entirety of the African race.

"When I speak I speak for all Africans everywhere, whether in L.A. or Harlem, Jamaica or Africa or Haiti — everywhere. When I say 'I' I mean 'I is me is you is he is she is them is we is us is them.' We are all reflections of each other and when I speak I speak for the African race," Souljah said.

Sister Souljah addressed the issue of reverse discrimination. "Affirmative Action is not reverse discrimination," Souljah said. "The only way reverse discrimination could ever exist is to go back 500 years in history and have the white man be taken from his land, sold to Europeans, his wife raped, his babies killed and his land taken from him for 500 consecutive years."

"It is the job of every African man and woman to DO. To go out into the world and develop his own skills and to bring them back to the African community and develop African businesses," Souljah said.

"It is our job to develop our community in every aspect —mentally, socially, psychologically, physically, educationally, emotionally and militarily," Souljah said.

one of Shimmy Discs' best sellers. "Jesus Was Way Cool" became an instant "indie" hit, "Jesus was way cool/he said eat my body and drink my blood/that's so cool!" are just some of the lyrics to a rather quiet song sung nonchalantly to a Barry Manilow-like piano solo in the background.

The rest of the album is noise, but not that kind of noise that makes parents reach for the Metamucil. It's unusually commercially accessible.

Their success on the independent charts has landed them a rather comfortable major label deal with Atlantic records (all of the Indie bands are getting gobbled up by big money record companies these days.)

King Missile's major label position has not affected their creativity. It sounds as if they were in the position to call all of the shots, thus finally making the album they really wanted to, with the money they needed.

They play at Pearl Street tonight with local, Cape Cod alternative thrashers, Earshot and Violently Ill at 8:30 sharp. The show is 18+, and don't forget your I.D!

Livingston Taylor livens up the Iron Horse

DANA L. FORRAR
and JENNIFER L. FOX

"Above all else, I'm an entertainer."

When Livingston Taylor told this to reporters years ago, he was still just making it. Now it's 1992, his hairline is receding and his joints ache, but he still gives an audience every penny's worth. And in these eyes, he's made it.

The instant we saw Livingston associating freely among the Iron Horse's audience last Saturday night, we knew it'd be a helluva personalized show. How many musicians are inclined to relax in the audience with their spouses and give the opening act as much attention as a paying customer?

His big blue eyes were opened wide with appreciation for local folk artist Leah Kunkel. One could see his love for the music, almost read into his eyes how happy he was. He entertains large groups of people, he does what he loves and he gets paid to do it. Why shouldn't he love it?

Leah Kunkel roused the audience with some of her own originals, her melodic voice dancing round the keys she was playing. As Leah put it, Liv rehires her because she makes him look that much more entertaining. It works.

Her songs were centered on depression and love depression and her Kathy Bates-like countenance helped it along. She ended with a timeless heart-wrenching rendition of "Brother Can you Spare a Dime," and Steven Bishop's "On and On."

Livingston's easy-going demeanor was confirmed by his appearance on stage in a sweater-vest sporting a rather substantial cow on the front. We felt like we were in his living room. He talked about his dog Diesel, or his full name, "No Diesel down no biting." We were at home.

His set was perfectly timed, upbeat countered by slower songs, like perfectly timed rest stops on a long road trip. Later he said "I haven't had a set list since 1972." He has played live so many times that he knows the movement of the audience and adjusts.

Livingston did songs like "Carolina Day", a fun song of getting out of work called "Armageddon Rag," as well as "The Dollar Bill Song," "I've Got My Pajamas On" and Pete Seger's "Dance with Me." He then decided it was folk time and did the lyrical wonder "Railroad Bill," as well as a song about his dog Diesel in "Doggie Jail."

Leah then joined Livingston on stage and they did "I Will" from the Beatles, "Loving Arms" and a song he did with brother James on his Life's Been Good album, "City Lights." When Livingston remarked "James isn't here tonight," no one seemed miffed and Leah provided great backup to that beautiful song.

He put his trusty six string down and played three songs on the piano, with a Bill Withers song "No Easy Way to Break Somebody's Heart" as the highlight of the evening.

Livingston again changed roles as he picked up his banjo and played just as deftly and artfully as he had on the piano and guitar. He poked fun at some songs and how they weren't supposed to be done on the banjo, epitomized by "You're So Vain" from Carly Simon, who at one time was married to brother James.

When he left the stage we all felt an emptiness, one of those Hemingway moments, but he immediately resumed the stage for a brilliant encore, beginning with the Wizard of Oz theme "If I Only Had a Heart," with the audience whistling away the chorus. He broke into the song "Grandma's Hands" to the applause of the audience, and once we heard it we knew why.

He left again and this time we were more fulfilled, the encore filling our hearts and filling our ears with catchy choruses and funny remarks. But most importantly we remembered his smile, an infectious smile that we caught and wore on our mugs for the rest of the night.

While predicting the last few years of this decade, century and millenium will be dominated by the most controversial issue in the history of the American church — the role of women, Kushner sees the future as bright.

"We need to hear the women's voices," Kushner said, saying he was incredulous at the "neglect of the wisdom of 50 percent of the human race," until this point. He expressed the importance of the female voice in any issue, citing women's "distinctive way at looking at things."

Kushner said while men deal in abstract issues, women deal with feelings, a concept he illustrated with reference to the abortion controversy. He said men question whether the fetus has nerve-endings and thus a right to life, while women question the feelings of the one most involved — the mother.

Stating that women have been invaluable in the study of medicine, Kushner said he believes in the church of the future there will be equality for women.

New emphasis on the family will also be responsible for the shaping of the "New-Age Religion," Kushner predicted. He said he believes the student population of today will have different values than those of their parents. "Success" for the parents of today's students meant financial success, a good job. Kushner sees the "New generation" as being unable to better their parents, as they emerge from college into an extremely difficult job market.

He suggests that today's students face a dilemma: Either they must resign themselves to failure, or they must redefine success, as something other than the 'fiscal success' of their parents. Kushner said he predicts a shifting of values to something more spiritual and family oriented. "I measure success not by my salary check, but by the quality of my life," Kushner said.

Kushner said the new definition of success would include an increased importance placed on the synagogue and church. While Kushner indicates a decline in orthodoxy in the coming millennium, he suggests an increased importance in the family and thus the community, centered around the synagogue or church, with equal rights for men and women alike.

However, as Kushner concluded, "There are only two rules to predicting future social trends — the first being to take what is going on today and assume a continuation, the second being that rule one is always wrong."

decides to donate they are not only helping Danny, but many other people as well," he said.

Colbert said his friend, Paul Yates, who is social chairperson of the fraternity Phi Mu Delta, is organizing a fund raising party in honor of Danny. "My family is very pleased with how much people have cared about Danny, and the donations they have received," Colbert said.

The fundraisers different organizations have put on have raised thousands of dollars, Colbert said. "Any contribution — no matter how big or small — would be greatly appreciated by my family," he said.

"Danny is an energetic and outstanding little kid who is constantly on the go," said Colbert.

Colbert, 19, said his family has found donor matches, but has been unable to get into contact with these people because they either moved or have died. "My one wish for Danny is that a donor be found and he is cured," said Colbert.

There will be a blood sampling for people interested in donating marrow, this Sunday, March 1 from 11 a.m. until 6 p.m. at Saint John's Church in Peabody. Monetary donations can be mailed to Paul Colbert, who lives in room 1002 of Kennedy Residence Hall.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Your personal magnetism helps you win the trust and admiration of influential people now. Special arrangements are made by those who share long-term goals.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): This is not a good day to stick your neck out. Mark time until work conditions improve. Your innovative ideas will get better reception if you wait until March gets underway.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A happy meeting of the minds makes it easier for you to obtain higher-ups' approval now. Be objective, instead of suspicious, about a co-worker's suggestion to improve productivity.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Spend some time helping a family member sort out a personal problem. A hobby could turn into a real moneymaker. Join a community group if time and energy permit.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A promotion or raise may be way overdue. Work harder to improve your personal relationships at work. Someone close to you wants you to know they care.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Approach any financial problems with an open mind. Eliminating certain frills will help you meet your obligations to your family. A new romantic interest appears on the scene.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Strong desires could push you to dangerous limits today, putting your reputation or money at risk. Be careful not to burn your bridges. Work is your safety net — get caught up in it!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Someone may voice strong objections to your plans today. Good vibes are conspicuously absent — fill the void. A beautiful brunette brightens your day.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Talks and travel lead to success. Do not be afraid to discuss your worries. A forthright approach to romance will prove highly rewarding. It is important you remain polite and patient.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Domestic and financial changes are easy to implement today. Valuable allies remain in your corner. Show your gratitude. Interesting new information comes to light.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Those who share your interests are particularly important to your financial future. Now is the time to discuss work-family conflict. Speak your mind.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): It takes two to make a happy marriage. A secret relationship could be a time bomb. The clock is ticking. Let family members know how much they mean to you. Be affectionate.

It seems Dave's curiosity was a bit stronger than the rest of ours put together. Armed with screwdrivers, a hammer, a saw, and a plan, he began the excavation piece-by-piece. Each section of the floor contained particular jewels. Lou Gehrig, a 1958 Topps' Stan Musial, and footballs 'Jimmy' Brown are just some of the gems he found. The card that attracted the most attention was of a 28-year old second baseman for the Kansas City Athletics — Joe Morgan, former Red Sox skipper.

The collection of cards, some 150, also includes cards from rare sets that are not found in today's pricing books. Fleer baseball cards ran a kind of Hall-of-Fame series with the likes of Ted Williams, Carl Hubbell and Jimmy Foxx. All of which are now safe in Dave's hands.

My father was always searching for a way to make his fortune, sometimes in odd ways. Isn't it ironic that a pot o'gold was within his reach. If he were around today, I bet my floor wouldn't be the only floor, or for that matter wall or ceiling, to be removed.

First place at stake in West Virginia

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts basketball team left from the Curry Hicks Cage early yesterday morning knowing full well that its trip to West Virginia will most likely determine which team finishes first in the Atlantic 10 during the regular season.

The stakes are high, as a win at Morgantown tonight (7:30 p.m., Ch. 22) would virtually lock up the A-10 regular season crown and entitle the Minutemen (22-4, 10-3 in the Conference) to a home game in the A-10 tournament finals if they advance that far.

Also on the line is the team's ranking in the Associated Press poll, currently No. 26. A win at West Virginia (17-8, 9-4) and then Duquesne Sunday would give UMass 24 wins and. . . well, you know the scenario. But we're getting a little ahead of ourselves.

First things first — tonight's game.

"I feel we have something to prove against West Virginia," said last week's A-10 Player of the Week, UMass center Harper Williams. "If we lose and still win the league, it won't feel right. It will be like something's just not finished. It will be like an incomplete."

Just four days after the Minutemen had beaten Oklahoma and two days after being ranked in the Top 25 for the first time ever, the Minutemen hosted West Virginia at the Cage on Jan. 8 and were stunned by the Mountaineers, 76-75.

UMass could not stop West Virginia's big men, as Pervires Greene and Ricky Robinson combined for 29 points and Chris Leonard added 14 from the outside.

In the end, UMass could not overcome a 37-26 halftime deficit, nor could it figure out a way to stop West Virginia from scoring uncontested layups in its half-court offense. The end result, a one-point loss.

The victory over UMass started West Virginia on a 10-game winning streak which included wins over Notre Dame and Temple.

But since that streak, things have gone sour for the Mountaineers. Point guard Marsalis Basey, a Muggsy Bogues replica, was suspended for a game by coach Gale Catlett for violating team rules just two weeks ago.

Basey is back now, but during his absence, the Mountaineers hit a cold spell. They have lost three of their last four games, including Sunday's 85-78 loss at George Washington, which dropped them to second place in the A-10.

Last season, the Minutemen won in the West Virginia University Coliseum for the first time ever, a 98-89 decision, in which UMass shot 67 percent for the game.

Game Notes — UMass forward Jim McCoy has averaged 23.1 points per game in his eight career games against West Virginia.

The Mountaineers lead the series 26-6.

A win tonight would tie this year's Minuteman team with Julius Erving's 1970-71 team which won 23 games, their most ever in a season.

The game can be heard on WMUA (91.1 FM) or on WHMP (99.3 FM). It can be seen on Ch. 22.

UMass is ranked 33rd in the USA Today/CNN coaches poll, 20th in the Sagarin's computer poll.

Tickets for the UMass-Rhode Island game to be played on Mar. 4 at the Cage are being handed out today at the Cage.

The Atlantic 10 is 3-1 vs. the Big 8. No other conference has more than one win against the top rated league in the country.

The Minutemen take on Duquesne Sunday at 4:30 p.m. in Pittsburgh. The game can be seen on SportsChannel.

KEY MATCHUPS

Harper Williams vs. Ricky Robinson — The pro scouts will be watching this one. . . Williams is one of the premiere players in the A-10, but so is Robinson. Both players are averaging 13.8 points per game, while Robinson has the edge on the boards, 7.2 to 6.9.

Jim McCoy vs. Chris Leonard — This matchup will prove just how good McCoy's defense is, as he will have to defend against the Mountaineers' leading scorer, Leonard, who is averaging 16.2 ppg and is the top 3-point shooter in the Conference with 46 percent accuracy.

Card digging in the floor

Nothing like going home on a Friday for a nice quiet weekend, right? Home-cooked meals, visits with friends, playing 'bite my foot' with the family dog.

Well, imagine going home to find out your room had been literally excavated. Every floorboard removed — domestic strip mining, if you will. Odd, you say, read on.

Before I tell you what happened three weeks ago, let me tell you what happened some 30 years ago. My two oldest brothers, Paul and John, then 11 and 5 respectively, were normal kids. They did normal kid things, rode bikes, played ball and collected baseball cards. In those days, baseball cards were objects to be flipped against walls and stuck in the spokes of one's bike.

Joe Donovan

"Ball was big," John told me. "Of course, we played baseball and wiffleball all the time."

My father would buy Paul and John cards, but John didn't care much for the cards, just the gum.

"I would only want the gum," John said. "Back then, gum was the size of an actual card. So I remember sticking the cards through the cracks in the floor." Little did John know, what he was doing would now be considered a felony. In 1992, baseball cards are big money and the thought of someone ruining them brings tears to many collectors' eyes.

Cards today are sealed up and stored away for safe keeping. My 14-year old nephew even has a lock box for his cards. He's no dummy, unlike my older brothers.

So some 30 years later, when my brother Dave decided to take up the floor in my room, (little did he know what kind of buried treasure would be there), to his surprise, and Paul and John's dismay, he struck gold. For 30 years, 6 boys had grown up in that room, ignorant to what they were walking on. Sure, we knew the cards were there, but no one really knew how many and what variety they were. I recall rainy days with a string and some gum, trying to reach down between those cracks, just to

Seniors Riley and Moran to play final home game

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

This isn't the way these things are supposed to happen.

When a team plays its last home game of the season, it's supposed to be a cakewalk, a blowout, a tribute to the seniors who have played so hard throughout their careers.

Tonight the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team carries its 4-20 record, (0-13 in the A-10), into its home finale, and while the possibility of blowout by the Minutewomen still exists, it is unlikely.

The opponent is 15th ranked George Washington (18-5, 8-4), and it is the season's first meeting between the Minutewomen and the Colonial Women.

"This game should be easy to get up for," said UMass coach Joanie O'Brien. "We've got nothing to lose. Absolutely nothing. They're supposed to come in and they're supposed to crush us."

The game will be the last Curry Hicks Cage appearances for senior-eligible forward Jen Moran and senior point guard Trish Riley, who is likely to miss her second straight game with a hip injury.

The Colonial Women are coming off a 61-60 loss Monday to 13th ranked West Virgina, while the Minutewomen are coming off last weekend's 73-47 loss at the hands of St. Joseph's.

The key for UMass will be defense. George Washington's high-powered offense is averaging 74 points per game, so the Minutewomen will have to improve on the 66 points their defense already allows.

"We've got to go out and do the things that we can do," O'Brien said. "We're going to force them to play a game that maybe they don't want to play. Try some different things that they're going to have to adjust to."

The Colonial Women are led by a reserve, 6-4 senior center Mary Nordling, who is averaging 15 points and six rebounds per game. Martha Williams, a 6-5 freshman, and Darlene Saar, a 6-1 freshman, also play a big role in the G.W. offense, combining for almost 16 points and nine rebounds.

Kim Kristofik's 13 points and 12 boards lead the Minutewomen. Moran adds about 12 points and six rebounds per contest.

"We're going to go out and have some fun," O'Brien said. "If we can't get our team ready to play the team ranked 15th in the country, then we're not going to get ourselves ready to play anybody."

Demand another $18 million from state

By DAVID RIVERA
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – The Board of Trustees of the University of Massachusetts tentatively agreed yesterday not to raise tuition or fees for students next year.

The agreement, which occurred at an informal meeting in Boston, is in direct defiance of Gov. Weld's budget proposal which would cut spending to the University.

If passed by the Board today, it will be the first time in 27 years that tuition and fees at the Amherst campus have not been raised.

In an even bolder statement, the Trustees said they would not except the same amount of money allocated to the state University system last year and demanded an $18 million increase.

Kevin Newnan, UMass Student Trustee, said he believes this proposal will send a message to the Statehouse.

"This sends a message to the legislature and the message tells them — we've had enough," Newnan said.

David Loh, UMass-Boston Student Trustee, joined Newnan in support of the motion.

"We are here for people whose parents have never been to college," Loh said. "We are here for low-income students."

In a two-hour meeting that Newnan described as "debate-filled," trustees and administrators argued the pros and cons of the divisive issue which both sides agree will ultimately have adverse affects on the University.

"It's great," said Johan Malone, a UMass sophomore. "I had to take off last semester because off money problems so I know what the cuts have done."

Paul Page, vice chancellor of Administration and Finance, believes students will still bear the burden from a tuition freeze and is adamantly against it.

"It's a no win situation," Page said. "Everybody will lose if it does pass."

Saying the issue was "potentially detrimental," Page added the plan may cost students more money in the end and cause a reduction in University services.

"It may not come out of students pockets," he said, "but it means longer lines and fewer discussion sections."

State Senator Stan Rosenberg said the Governor and the legislature will now be forced to address the issue of higher education and the deterioration it has suffered.

Rosenberg commended the Board in its stand by saying the message will clearly open new issues that the Weld administration had hoped to ignore.

"I think it's good," Rosenberg said. "It's about time the board drew a line in the sand."

UMass, second only to the University of Vermont as the nation's most-expensive state school, has had to deal with both budget cuts and fee increases which have lowered enrollment and lead to the physical deterioration of its campus.

Yesterday's informal meeting stemmed from a new provision requiring trustees to recommend tuition rates before March 15.

The full and formal board is expected to meet today and vote on the motion.

In 1964, the in-state tuition and fees for UMass-Amherst was $939 while in 1988 tuition and fees amounted to $5,322, accordingto the Office of Institutional Research and Planning.

House Budget Comm. pushes defense cuts

By ALAN FRAM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A divided House Budget Committee on Thursday approved a Democratic budget that doubles President Bush's proposed defense cuts and pours the money into domestic programs such as education and into deficit reduction.

Bush opposes siphoning defense funds as the democrats propose and Republicans were against the plan. But because democrats dominate the committee, the measure was adopted on a voice vote and sent to the full House for a vote next week.

"The president said, 'Let's hold onto the status quo,'" said House Budget Committee Chairman Leon Panetta, D-Calif., of Bush's fiscal 1993 budget. "There's a bolder plan. . . Let's go for it."

Ranking committee republican Rep. Willis Gradison of Ohio said Democrats can't resist "feeling that every time we can find a loose dime, we ought to go out and spend it." He said Democratic plans to shift defense funds to domestic program

UM students aid hospital in Jamaica

By KRISTEN LANS
Collegian Correspondent

Four University of Massachusetts nursing students spent January break at a rural hospital in Jamaica assisting staff with maternity, pediatric and emergency care.

Seniors Christine Averill, Julie Kantaros, Laurie Farquharson and Elma Lagendyk worked forty hours a week between shifts at Princess Margaret Hospital and a community outreach program in the poorest district on the island.

The women received hands-on experience during their three weeks at the hospital. They delivered babies, treated children, stitched wounds and fixed broken limbs. In the outreach program they visited homes to give mothers pre-natal assessments.

Lack of basic instruments, supplies and technology led to a lot of improvising by the students.

According to Averill, rum was used as an antiseptic to sterilize everything from machete wounds to the umbilical cords of newborns.

Farquharson said in a released statement, "It takes the Jamaican hospital two or three months to use supplies that would be used in one day in a U.S. hospital."

The hospital is understaffed, averaging twelve patients to one nurse. There are 100,000 people in the district served by Princess Margaret Hospital, with only 7 nurses and 3 doctors to serve them.

Lagendyk admitted to feeling culture shock when she arrived in Jamaica.

Averill said, "At the end of the first week we all

Project to test safety of water

UMass teams up with New England Water Works

By SARAH LEVESQUE
Collegian Correspondent

Proving the maxim that two heads are better than one, the University of Massachusetts has teamed up with the New England Water Works Association to establish a unique, multi-media package to educate the public and New England water suppliers about new federal Environment Protection Agency requirements concerning the safety of drinking water.

In the first step of the project, the University and Water Works Association are focusing on informing water suppliers of the Lead and Copper rule, Maximum Contamination Goals and how to collect and test samples.

Once this is achieved, these suppliers will inform their customers how to begin testing their own household tapwater. The EPA has given the University and Water Works Association $50,000 each for the joint project.

If the level of lead reaches 15 micrograms per liter of water or the level of copper reaches 1,300 micrograms per liter in ten percent of the samples, according to the EPA, drinking water suppliers must take steps to reduce the levels.

Dr. Charles Gilbert, a professor of Public Health at the University, explains why lead can be dangerous in his presentation paper "Overview of Lead Health Effects" which he discusses at seminars for water utility managers.

"Usually, water does not supply a high level of lead and will not by itself cause poisoning. However, since lead accumulates in the body we want to reduce lead exposure from all sources and drinking water lead levels should be as low as possible," Gilbert said.

"It is estimated that typical lead levels in drinking water make up 20 percent of a two year-old child's lead exposure," he said.

On June 7, 1991, the EPA announced its more stringent drinking water regulations for lead and copper. The University and Water Works Association are spearheading this project to increase awareness of the new guidelines for the New England area.

Under the 1991 rule, tap water samples must be taken at high-risk locations: homes with lead pipes, lead service lines or homes with service lines with lead soldering installed after 1982. Furthermore, the water must be allowed to stand motionless in plumbing pipes for at least six hours before a sample is taken.

A ten minute video titled "How to sample your drinking water for lead and copper content" is a training guide for water utilities and is due out in April.

A workbook, advisory pamphlets and other educational material to be included with the water bills all developed by the University, are due out in May.

Ted Kenney, educational coordinator for the New England Water Works Association said the seminars, the video and other educational materials "positively enforce the bond that you and I as consumers are partners in the

Cocaine found on 2-year-old

HOLYOKE (AP) — A 2-year-old girl was found carrying 11 vials of crack cocaine in her pocket after apparently picking them up in her mother's apartment, police said Thursday.

The vials were allegedly the property of the woman's boyfriend, who turned himself in to police Thursday and was arrested on drug charges.

The vials were found Wednesday morning at a day care home after the girl's mother, a 16-year-old high school student, called the home and asked the teacher to check the girl's pockets.

The child was apparently attracted to the bright red vials, said Holyoke police officer Marlene Werenski.

"If the child had thought they were candy and passed them out, we would have had a real tragedy," Werenski said.

The Department of Social Services obtained temporary custody of the child pending an investigation into the matter.

The mother's boyfriend, Encarnacion Alvarado,was arrested on charges of possession of crack cocaine and possession with intent to distribute, Werenski said.

were "pie-in-the-sky talk" and would ultimately be defeated.

In early votes, the panel rejected an effort by Rep. Jim McCrery, R-La., to limit the budgets's defense cuts to Bush's proposed spending levels. Two Republicans joined 22 Democrats in voting against the amendment, overwhelming the 13 remaining GOP members.

The $1.5 trillion spending plan for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1 opens the latest front in the election-year battle between Bush and Democrats over the economy. Democrats unveiled their budget as the House was voting on competing tax-cut packages advanced by the two parties.

Bush has proposed paring defense spending by $50 billion over the next six years, and holding next year's military budget to $281 billion — $7.4 billion less than previously planned. In a bid to retain conservative support, Bush has said he will cut no deeper and vowed to veto any use of the savings for domestic initiatives.

Democrats say that the with the Cold War's demise, pentagon funds can be shifted to programs that will make the country more competitive.

Their budget proposes holding defense spending to $273.4 billion — $7.6 billion less than Bush wants and a total of $15 billion below current plans.

Another combination which seems to have proven successful is, states Dr. Gilbert, "the combination of the academic and the practical. The multi-media approach has also been a success. All the seminars have been well attended."

The entire program format has made the joint project a possible model, according to Dr. Gilbert, for the rest of the nation which faces the same challenges.

Ted Kenney summed up the project. "(It) is truly proving to be a means to reach the EPA's goal, which is to get as much information out there to assist the water utilities with the new rule. Everyone benefits."

Prof: women face bias from teachers

By STACY MALONE
Collegian Correspondent

Women in grammar schools are not being encouraged to enter the field of science, according to a University of Massachusetts physics professor.

Professor Jennie Traschen said on Wednesday that women are steered away from science and not given the chance to become involved in the sciences. The lecture, entitled "Women in Science: Where Are You?", was part of the weekly Women's Studies Brown Bag Lecture Series.

Traschen said she has been with the UMass Physics Department for three years. "A lot of what you do relies on the belief that you at least have a chance of doing it," she said.

Speaking from personal experience, Traschen said women face physical isolation from such subjects as math and science early in their lives, contributing to the scarce amount of women in these professional fields.

Working in Physics Departments at Harvard University, along with institutions in Chicago, Santa Barbara, other parts of the United States and England, she said she has found reoccurring trends facing women in science fields.

Traschen said one such trend is "all women have a proving period unlike men" where women must prove that they are capable of being in the science field which is a male dominated profession.

Other reoccurrences Traschen said most women scientists face are that "men are often very hesitant in dealing with women because it is not common for women to be treated as knowledgeable or a science resource."

Traschen said men often "talk to you like you are an idiot, a dog, or a fool," because women are not usually acknowledged for their abilities.

Traschen said frequently there is a "betrayal of profession" where male scientists will use their professional status to ask a woman on a date.

Transchen said she often felt "slapped in the face in terms of my ability as a scientist."

Traschen said through her experiences in different departments she has learned to "look at it politically and not personally."

She also said UMass is the least sexist out of the several Physics Departments she has worked in.

"Here at UMass they talk to me as a scientist rather than another category," Traschen said.

Prof studies reproduction and calories

By CAROLINE NASSON
Collegian Correspondent

A University of Massachusetts psychology professor is currently exploring the link between calorie intake and reproduction in female mammals ranging from mice to humans.

George N. Wade, a professor at UMass for almost 20 years, has noted that reproduction is energy expensive and requires many calories in order to have healthy offspring.

"If indeed a female attempts to reproduce during unavailable calorie time, she may lose the baby or the litter, depending on the species of the animal, and even the mother can die," Wade said.

Wade, along with two graduate students, Sandra Berriman and Hui-Yun Li, are conducting basic research funded by the National Institute of Health. The researchers are depriving hamsters of food during the first two days of their ovulatory cycle.

They have found that with the lack of food, ovulation stops. This is similar to when women with eating disorders and endurance athletes who need to stay thin have a depressed ovulation as a result from too few calories.

If this and other animal work has implications for human reproduction, then this research suggests that we should not focus on how thin or fat women are, but how many calories they take in, said Wade.

Being thin is not incompatible with reproduction as long as a women takes in enough calories, he said.

If there are not enough calories being used to fuel the body, there is mounting evidence that the

Students sacrifice for students

Do without activities to help out poorer students

By DAVID DISHNEAU
Associated Press

State spending cuts in higher education are prompting administrators, faculty ad students at some campuses to fight back with philanthropy.

Although forced tuition increases and student protests have bee the most common responses to the cutbacks, a number of individuals and groups on campuses around the country recently decided to give something up to help the neediest students.

At least three new presidents of colleges or universities chose to forgo elaborate inauguration ceremonies to free up more funds for scholarships.

The student government of a New York college expanded an emergency loan fund at the expense of student activities.

The student government at the University of Illinois asked all students to vote on whether they would bear a $40 tuition increase to help students who are losing some of their scholarship money And 69 current and former faculty members at the school agreed to contribute to a fund for needy students, whether the tuition increase passes or not.

The proposal to raise U of I tuition is aimed at offsetting a loss of $924,000 i state scholarships. Unofficial totals Thursday showed that students voted 2, 402-1,770 against the measure, the University said. Nearly 29,000 students did not vote on the issue.

The very idea of students voting on a tuition increase is "remarkable," said Gay Clyburn, spokeswomen for the American Association of State Colleges ad Universities.

"I have never seen students coming up with such an imaginative proposal," she said in a telephone interview from the organization's Washington office.

An association survey found that 19 states reduced funding for higher education during fiscal 1992 and nine more expect to. The average tuition increase in the states that sustained midyear cuts was 14.4 percent.

At private Wheelock College in Boston, which suffered a 51 percent cut in state aid, President Gerald N. Tirozzi canceled a March 20 inauguration ceremony and directed that the $35,000 be used for scholarships for inner-city students to attend the school.

Frank B. Bruno, president of Dean Junior College in Franklin, Mass., took similar steps.

"I have concluded that it would not be fiscally responsible to proceed with an inauguration," Walker said in a statement. "It would send the wrong message about the priorities of the University."

The student government of John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York added $10,000 to an emergancy loan fund established last year. Students can apply for loans of up to $500.

The proposed $40 tuition increase at the University of Illinois in Champaign was rushed onto the ballot for a regular student election after Gov. Jim Edgar ad the General Assembly in January ordered 3 percent budget cuts in all state agencies

The voter turnout of more than 5,000 on Tuesday and Wednesday was at least 1,000 more than in previous elections, said Kathy Metro, who chairs the Student Election Commission.

"A lot of people are concerned that the money's not there and something needs to be done,: she said.

As and alternative to raising tuition, the university's Board of Trustees could bill the students whose scholarship awards will fall short of expectation due to state cuts. that it the route virtually all other public universities i Illinois have taken.

About 6,000 students would be billed an average of $160 to cover the shortfall in their annual grants, which average about $2,570, according to the Illinois Student Assistance Commission, a state agency.

Commissioner David Eisenman first proposed the $40 tuition increase. Eisenman also has been lining up faculty members, alumni and others to pay what he hopes will be a $5,000 fund to help the neediest students.

wanted to go home, we couldn't stand seeing people die there that wouldn't have died here."

The women also noticed a difference between American nurses and British nurses who work at the hospital.

"The nurses tell patients to be quiet during labor, so many women snap their fingers instead of crying out when they are in pain," said Averill.

"We couldn't figure out whether the patients respect the nurses or are scared of them," she said.

This is the second year that Melanie Dreher, dean of the University's School of Nursing has arranged for students to volunteer in Jamaica.

Dreher has been traveling between UMass and Jamaica, where she does research for over twenty years.

"They really helped people, and they learned not to complain about the lack of staff or equipment," she said.

"You can still be a good nurse and give good care in less than optimal conditions," said Dreher.

Three of the four students have made reservations to return for a visit to Jamaica after their graduation in May.

hypothalamus — the part of the brain which controls reproductive functions — can shut down leading to infertility.

"The opportunity to research this topic is great at UMass, because there is a large and diverse group of people in neuroendocrinology and different departments have similar interests with similar expertise," said Wade.

"It's one real area of excellence at UMass," he said.

Does UMass really have the money for cultural centers?

Cultural diversity/multiculturalism seems to be one big taboo in the UMass community this year. The closings of the United Asia Cultural Center, the Latin American Cultural Center and the White Eagle Native American Cultural Center sparked a lot of controversy internally among all three of the communities. Myself being a Native, involved with the White Eagle Cultural Center closing, I have witnessed controversy in our community as well. The closing has caused me to ask myself some thought-provoking questions. Some of these questions are very simple questions that I think people in every community forgot to ask themselves. Does the University have anymore money to spend to settle the demands of these communities? Does it have any money at all to spend on anything, including the cultural centers? What good do the closings do, and will it affect the administration? Should we try to get the demands all at once or should we try for them one at a time? Are the cultural centers really a form of tokenism? What is the real purpose of these centers?

Well, to answer the first question about whether the University has money or not, to be honest, I don't think so. Since I read the article about the Physical Plant needing $400 million, that answered my question. Where UMass is supposed to get a few more million is beyond me. People here just think the state is going to say, here, just have five million. The state would rather cut 10 million than give any money for anything new in this University.

The next question I asked myself, does the University have money at all? Sure it does. All the centers are closed so they can use that money and pay some of the library's needs or even the Physical Plant's needs. That's a sick thought, but they could do that if they wanted to.

Kahon:wes

Whether the closings affected the administration or not, well, I don't think so. Maybe it burned their hopes and turned them to ashes. I think that's about all it did to the administration. Maybe it made them look like fools. We could have used the centers to support our demand, gaining support from the UMass community. I'm not trying to kill people's hopes of obtaining something good, but let's be realistic about things. The centers didn't benefit any while being closed. The only one who benefitted was the University; they didn't spend a dime on us.

Then there's my point that maybe we should have kept the centers open and protested one demand at a time. If this was done maybe the administration would be able to deal with them much faster. One example would be giving a set of demands that the centers know they might get, then try some more complicated demands. If there is one thing people are always told it's to do things one step at a time, don't rush. Well I admit that I rushed and I skipped a few steps. I just hope things will get done slowly but surely, not the quick and easy way. That's the direction it seems like these issues are headed in, since nobody is willing to listen and be patient.

I must not forget the people who constantly say that the centers are tokens. Maybe I'm just ignorant on the subject, but the students started the cultural centers. The fact is that they aren't token centers, the administration's attitude towards them is tokenist. The centers, in some aspects, should be changed, but the administration's attitude has to change first. Well maybe now that two people have explained this, the term "tokenism" will no longer be used so widely. Besides, I certainly do not feel like a token being at UMass. I may get caught in the paper work/run, but I am not a token.

Now to answer my last question about what I think the centers are for. I personally think a few words can answer this question. They serve to give the students a base at UMass, educate and whatever else we want them to do. That's only if they don't drown us in paper work first.

I think people, including myself, rushed these events with the cultural centers. Now it's time to think them over before we go any further. I just hope people take my opinion the way I take others. I respect their opinions, while respecting them.

Kahon:wes is a UMass student.

Wish you were here, Mario Cuomo

Mr. Atwater was doing so well in his article on Wednesday ("Bush is a lot like Clouseau") and I was standing by his side until the very last paragraph, where Atwater takes a decidedly large turn for the worse. He claims that voting for Bush is choosing the lesser of two evils. Buchanan is certainly no friend of mine, but I hardly see Bush as any better. As I recall, it was the policies of Bush and Reagan that got us to this dismal situation in the first place. People have been clamoring for changes in our infrastructure for years, decades even. Yet Bush and his cronies refused to heed the call, instead focusing on points of light and throwing up on the Japanese Prime Minister.

The best choice is to not vote Republican at all! Bush has demonstrated his incompetence at managing our economy and his indifference to domestic affairs. The President has upset conservatives so much that our own near and dear Republican Club has opted to support his opponent, Pat Buchanan, as the Republican candidate. Although Buchanan hardly offers a better alternative to the present economic mess with his calls for nationalist isolation.

So we are left with the Democrats. Tsongas says the things our country needs to hear, except he sounds (and for that matter, even looks like) Elmer Fudd. If Clinton could just keep his pants on (or, at least, out of the media) and if Kerrey could say something besides how he lost his leg in the war, we might have a few options. I'm still holding out for Cuomo. I'm from New York so I am biased, but I feel he has done a good job in my state and will do a better job for the nation. So all that needs to be done is to get run. Maybe then I will have a chance to vote for a candidate as opposed to voting against another.

The Democrats have not done such a hot job fielding candidates for office these past few decades. Remember Mondale? Or that straight-shooter for Governor, John Silber? Cuomo would give the Democratic party a chance to redeem itself. And while all of the Democratic candidates running for president offer more than Bush or Buchanan ever will, none of them strikes me as a real winner (except Governor "Moonbeam" Brown . . just kidding). I want a Presidential candidate I can get excited about, and Cuomo does the trick — he's savvy, quick-witted and raging for a fight. Just thinking of Bush and Cuomo slugging it out gets my nipples erect, and that has not happened over a political fight in a long time. All we have to do is convince him to get back in the fray. No small task, I'm sure, but one which would guarantee that November would be worth waiting for.

Virgin needs to reexamine goal

It's amazing. As each day rolls on by, I experience directly or indirectly, a spoonful (or a gallon on a bad day!) of unchallenged gender roles into which we are socialized. The pinnacle of this perhaps lies in Robert Wronski's column (25 Feb., 92).

Robert, I'm writing this because there is a much larger issue at hand, not just your evident (and unfortunate) shame about not having been "laid." The manner in which sexual relationships and sexuality are perceived is absolutely preconstructed, as you have shown in your run-down of what you were expected to have already "done" with "a girl." Your use of language such as "girls" and "sexual conquests" paints such a clear picture of what sex looks like through your eyes. Are you really so obsessed with your sexual history? Why don't you take some pressure off yourself and try to enjoy people a little more — or is that an obstacle to the final GOAL?

My second point is that I, as a WOMAN, do not appreciate being "allowed" by you to ask a man OR a woman to spend time with me. I hope that at this point in our lives people of both genders (in this culture) know that it is okay to let a woman or a man know that you "like" them. TAKE SOME RESPONSIBILITY FOR YOUR OWN (in)ACTIONS and quit hiding under the excuse of "I'm too shy" and "I have trouble talking to girls." If you have trouble talking to "girls" then imagine the mess you'd be in if you started to be in some of those "sexual conquests" that you mentioned!

Cookies smell better than butts

As I sit studying in the Bluewall, an elusive scent disturbs my reading. I soon recognize it as the smell of chocolate chip cookies. Unfortunately, not all of the odors in the BlueWall are that enjoyable. More and more, my studies are disturbed by the smell of cigarette smoke. As an asthmatic and a non-smoker, I prefer to sit in the non-smoking section. These areas are clearly marked by large signs suspended from the ceiling. Not all college students seem to be able to read, or else, only selectively. It is not uncommon to see people smoking in the no smoking area. To those of you who do smoke in non-smoking areas, please be more considerate of those around you.

Why we need a 200-foot wall on the US-Mexican border

I once had a neighbor who lived down the street from me. She was very impatient with us little riffraffs. We used to hit our various wiffle balls, baseballs and hockey pucks into her yard. We didn't like her because she was mean. She would take them from us, yell at us, and threaten to call the cops.

Eventually she just built a fence to keep us out.

I had another neighbor. She lived next door and was real nice. She had a rose garden. We used to hit our various wiffle balls, baseballs and hockey pucks into her yard also. She told us that we can go into her yard to get our balls as long as we didn't step on her roses. She was nice, and we never had a problem with her.

The reason I brought up these two anecdotes is this: we need to keep illegal immigrants out of the country, and I propose a 200-foot wall on the United States-Mexican border.

You see, there are some people who will always step on other people's rose bushes, and there are others who will show respect to other's property.

I respect those who immigrate to this country, adapt to the American way of life and make a success of themselves. These are the finest citizens, as they usually give something back to our country.

But those who enter our country illegally have no conscience and for the most part live off the fat of the land, only caring to better themselves at the expense of U.S. citizens.

Michael Morrissey

Ponder this thought: your taxes are paying for Pedro Schmoe's 12 children's education, as they jumped the fence or simply walked across the Rio Grande during a low period, or, my favorite, cut a hole in the chain links and walked through it.

Besides the obvious social deviance of these actions, this presents a problem. A new sub-culture emerges, usually near the border in the U.S., of overpopulated towns of non-English speaking, low-income, illegal immigrants.

These illegal immigrants undercut our fine U.S. workers by begging and pleading our bosses to hire them. Obviously, they are taking away from business, and they end up raising unemployment. Like we need more problems from criminals who aren't even citizens.

Besides that, what about the fact there are hundreds of Eastern Bloc citizens who are trained in science and even nuclear technology looking for a legal way to become citizens. The U.S. blocks their immigration, yet Pedro and his 12 children can run through a fence, and he doesn't even speak English?

Therefore, I propose we build a wall to keep these deviants out. To stop them from climbing over it, we can build it 200 feet high. The wall can be made out of brick, and it will be a source of pride for our country.

As our astronauts orbit into outer space, they will no longer take pictures of the Great Wall of China but rather the Great Wall of America. Tourists will come to the border to admire the wonderful craftsmanship of the best workers in the world.

It will also help employ thousands of United States workers (in the watchtowers alone), thereby boosting the economy. I'm sorry, George, but I've got to side with Buchanan on this one. It's a great idea whose time has come.

Hey, it worked in Berlin for about 40 years, didn't it (until Mr. Reagan single-handedly tore it down)? Like I've always said, good fences make good neighbors.

LA's Sun-60 radiates

By ROUBINA SURENIAN

Sun-60
Epic

When a new band emerges on to the music scene, it is immediately classified into a mix of various genres. SUN-60 is a band that will just not fit into any particular mold, because they can fit into anything and everything, and they do it with such conviction.

The Los Angeles based duo consisting of David Russo and Joan Jones have an interesting philosophy in that if any band member is sick or just unable to make a gig, the others just simply make do with what they have regardless. "Our goal was never to let the band overshadow the song," says David Russo, one of the co-creators of SUN-60. "That's why we never had a problem with going on stage with just a bass and guitar, or guitar and drums, or whatever."

SUN-60's style is very versatile and I admit I was quick to judge and classify them as an Indigo Girls-esque group with amazing harmony, ethereal vocals provided by Joan Jones, and feet-tapping drum and bass guitar rhythms. "Cold Water," a tune with a creative influence of blues and pop with vocals by Russo is an original catchy tune that remained in my head for a long time. Listening to the next song, "Landslide," I could immediately envision SUN-60 is a smoky L.A. nightclub or coffeehouse (where most of their time was spent) playing the beautiful melody provided by the piano which is complemented by Jones' heavenly, angelic voice as the song fades away into a dim whisper.

The practical outlook of creating their own sound and genre is representative of SUN-60's desire to make it big in the competitive music industry. Their quest has been realized by a signed contract with Epic records and their self-titled release SUN-60 is indicative of their fresh diversity that Russo blames gingerly on their background, "We both grew up in the media capitol [Los Angeles] of the world. We're a product of that and we draw on all the amazing diversity this city has to offer."

That diverseness is the key to the fresh, catchy melodies and mundane voice that just won't quit. If you're in the Indigo Girls mood, get out of the blues and embark on the fresh, radiant sound SUN-60 emits, and you won't be disappointed.

Gender swapping in Shakespeare's Shrew

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

One might ask how anyone in 1992 could purport to have a completely original production of a play which has been in the public domain for four centuries. Yet, "original" seems like the perfect word to describe the upcoming Tabula Rasa/Brush Up Your Shake-Speare Society's production of the Taming of the Shrew. Perhaps "unique" might be a better one.

Shakespeare purists may blanch, yet this expanded version of the Bard's classic truly promises to break new ground. Amongst the many new twists to this production is the possible world premiere of the play's ending.

It is perhaps unknown to most people, but the account of Petruchio and Katherin's courtship—the actual "taming of the shrew" —appears only as a play within a play.

Shakespeare's Shrew opens with a prologue, of "induction," in which we are introduced to one Christopher Sly. The character of Sly creates a frame device, as it is for Sly that "the Taming of the Shrew" is being performed. The obvious fault in this frame (and the reason the induction is often left out of productions) is that it contains no resolution. The play within a play ends, but after the prologue Christopher Sly is never heard from again.

The director of the UMass Shrew, Lisa "Riz" Risley-Aquizap, spent some time trying to trace down what she assumed were missing scenes. What she found was Taming of A Shrew—anonymous playscript from 1594, believed to be a bad quarto of Shakespeare's work. What it lacks is the style and grace of the canonized version, but what it boasts is four interludes and an epilogue completing the play's frame device. Risley-Aqiizap has restored these scenes to the accepted playtext, for what she believes may be the first time anywhere.

The surprises do not stop there.

Perhaps the most famous line from Shrew (one which was later used as the title for a musical version) is, simply "Kiss me Kate." That is one line which is not to be heard in this production, as Risley-Aquizap has attempted to broaden the scope of the play by reversing the genders of all the central characters. What has long been considered Shakespeare's most misogynic work, thus becomes a simpler play about relationships.

You take a big chance in doing a production like this," Risley-Aquizap admits, "but everything fell into place, magically."

Even the few minor subtleties and witticisms which had to be sacrificed, during rewrites, have been magically replaced by new ones. Simply turning the "shrew" from a Kate to a Peter provided a whole new body of humour. What is our newly liberate heroine looking for? "The prettiest Peter in Christendom."

The Taming of the Shrew will run for one week, at the end of April. Location to be announced.

Night Tripper tickled ivories at the Horse

By DERIC BLAIRE
Collegian Correspondent

Dr. John the Night Tripper tripped into Northampton's Iron Horse last weekend. Since his heydey in the early seventies, Dr. John has given up his spangled silver robes and ornate feathered headresses for more conservative stage attire. He used a walking stick with feathers hanging off. He wore several large stone and silver necklaces. These are all the remained of the exotic garb Mac once wore in his voodoo rock period.

A five-piece band backed up Dr. John, a.k.a. Malcolm John Rebennack, Jr. (Mac). Freddy Stally was on drums, David Barrard was on bass, Hugh McCracken was on guitar, and Jerry Vevino played the tenor saxophone while Big Chief Smiley Ricks was on percussion.

The show was somewhat anticlimatic after he played his two greatest hits first: "Iko Iko" and "The Right

Radio's mixed signals

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

"Powered by Imagination" — the ads and trailer exclaims. "An uplifting tale that will touch your heart and move you" — the commercial states. Once these crafty campaigns have you in the theater, however, Radio Flyer becomes a darker tale of child abuse, secrets, and "the big idea," where the message becomes mired in a strangely downbeat and manipulative way.

11 year old Elijah Wood (Paradise) and eight-year old Joseph Mazzello (Presumed Innocent) play Mike and Bobby, two kids in the 1960's who travel to California with their mother (Lorraine Bracco) to start a new life. But when Bracco remarries a man nicknamed "the King" (Adam Baldwin), their life turns into a nightmare. When the King begins to beat the younger Bobby, he wants to escape. Thus begins their "big idea" — to fly away in their converted Radio Flyer.

Radio Flyer is too erratic to be taken as either an uplifting tale or a dark melodrama. At one moment, the kids are happy and lost in the wonder of childhood, the next, terrified of the King. The film becomes a cheery take on brothers and then a scary dream where the King haunts their lives. The two styles don't mix, especially in a film wrongly targeted at kids.

Director Richard Donner (Superman) attempts to create a little film with big intentions. However, he uses tired gimmicks in a manipulative way. Tom Hanks (in an unbilled cameo) plays an older Mike in a framing device that is clumsy and vague. Also, the way the film places the children in a helpless predicament, constantly fearing the King, is a cheap way to create tension.

Radio Flyer even stoops to putting the kids' dog, a Lassie-type German Shepard into jeopardy. People can usually handle people-abuse in movies (Terminator 2), but when a film starts hurting animals, people get pissed.

Radio Flyer chose to never show the King's face — a gimmick that further reduces the King to a plot point instead of a character. The film's close tries to be mythical, but Radio Flyer never hooks one enough to swallow such an unbelievable ending.

Lorraine Bracco makes up for her dismal performance in Medicine Man to create a sensitive portrayal of a mother who cares, even though she can't be there all the time.

Like the recently overrated Grand Canyon, Radio Flyer has no clue what its focus is, though the latter is decidedly more of a mess. It's no wonder this film was delayed so much, as it was first scheduled to be released last summer.

Radio Flyer's earnestness turns out to be its chief flaw. It wants to be too many things, never achieving its goal. It's too bad that the fine performances of Wood, Mazzello, and Bracco, as well as the fine photography by Laszlo Kovacs (Easy Rider) had to go down with it.

Grade: C+

Local scene's hoppin'

By BRIAN HARRINGTON
Collegian Staff

Look out and get out because there's whole smattering of good bands gigging this weekend.

Pearl Street is featuring two national acts upstairs on the big stage as the Marvelettes of 60's Motown fame check into town Friday night for an arts benefit and NRBQ shakes and rattles the house Saturday night. In keeping with Pearl Street custom there will be local acts opening both shows as well as bands performing in the room downstairs after the shows.

JABBERWOCKY

The Marvelettes may be the headliners Friday night but the real draw just might be local dance favorites Who's Kiddin' Who as the opener. You can bet that this warm up act will have the audience ready to sweat to the oldies when the Marvelettes hit the stage. If you want to go out dancing this weekend this is the show to see.

Don't forget to head downstairs after the show because another hot funky act, the Bombastics, will keep the music on the front burner until closing time. The Bombastics show is free to those with Marvelettes tickets and $3 for those who want to just check out a very good local act while keeping the entertainment budget under control.

Opening for NRBQ will be Ray Mason with his trademark Silvertone guitar and a powerfull backup band that in some respects resembles the NRBQ sound. The Ray Mason Band in fact is the semi-official opener for NRBQ when they appear around these parts. It's only rock and roll but I like it.

Rockin' Dave and the Rent Party will plug in downstairs at Pearl Street immediately after the NRBQ show. We're talking funky, grungy, psychedelic zydeco. Think of Buckwheat Zydeco meets the Chili Peppers. Who knows, maybe Al Anderson or Terry Adams of "the Q" will sit and jam?

Don't leave the Hadley Pub out of your weekend plans. The ever eclectic but always cerebral Free Press will be at the Hadley Pub on Saturday. Think of sweaty ska, a totally wacked out frontman and some political commentary to make an interesting stew.

If blues is your bag then why not go see the best of what the local blues scene has to offer. The Wildcat O'Halloran Band will be appearing at Sheehan's Cafe in Northampton tonight. The joint gets cookin' when the Wildcat is in his blues kitchen.

wonderful musicianship of the group and especially of Dr. John made the rest of the set delightful.

The fifty-one year old singer started his recording career when he was sixteen recording with artists like Professor Longhair and Leonard James. After 35 years in the business Mac did seem a little unenthusiastic at first but after a few rousing cheers for the audience he was more animated.

We were even treated to seeing Mac play guitar, which he learned from Fats Domino's guitar players when he was barely in his teens. Mac played a rosewood Gibson S.G. to "We're Gonna Pitch a Wang Dang Doodle all Night Long."

The best part of the show was Dr. John's piano intros. Mac tickles the ivories like few can, it was a joy to witness. What he lacked in showmanship, which he was once known for, he made up for in musicianship.

Most of the show was more traditional blues and jazz rather than the voodoo rock that Mac became well known for in the late sixties and early seventies.

Dr. John, after over three decades in the music business, still possesses that patented raspy voice singling, "I was the right place, but it must have been the wrong time." His voice coupled with his incredible talent on piano and guitar puts Dr. John in a class by himself in a class by himself as a musician, artist, producer, and performer.

Racquetball club nationally reknown

By ART STAPLETON
Collegian Correspondent

At this time of year, there is a club sport which is overshadowed by a successful hoop team and the upcoming lacrosse season here at the University of Massachusetts.

Meet the racquetball team.

A team which has existed at the University for almost eight years as a club sport. As a club sport, racquetball receives no funding from the University. It funds itself, maintaining a $10,000 budget.

The money raised pays for renting courts, travel fees, and league dues. The team receives contributions from local businesses, alumni, and former players. This season it will embark on a huge fund-raising campaign.

It competes in the American Collegiate Racquetball Association, which is made up of six regions across the country, with UMass being in the Eastern Collegiate Racquetball Conference, which includes some of the top schools in the country.

UMass emerged last year as the regional champion, with the men's team finishing ninth in the nationals.

The men are led by No. 1 seed Tim Dignam, senior Colin Silva, senior communications major Nathan Bearman, junior computer science major Russ Potter, and captain Alan Kurzontkowski.

The women are led by senior Lauren Anzer, junior communications major Tracy Call, and senior legal studies major Sara Nadolny.

Call, the women's captain, said her best friends are on the team and they are "really supportive on and off the court."

The team is coached by Michael Vecchiarelli, while the President is Bob Ansin. Even though they receive the recognition, they are quick to point out the team deserves most of the credit.

"I'd like to give a lot of the credit to the team, especially Tracy and Alan," Ansin said.

The full season contains four or five tournaments, the regional championships over spring break and the national championships, this year in Missouri.

The tournaments usually consist of three teams (all having both men's and women's teams) who compete in a series of three game matches.

The team has been active as of late, with the men's team dominating Providence College, holding them to only three games, and the women's team playing well in a loss to Providence, last season's No. 3 ranked team in the country.

In the same tournament, both teams succumbed to this year's powerhouse, Penn State.

UMass ended up splitting that tournament and they are looking ahead to the rest of the season.

"As No. 1 ranked player on the men's team, I'm looking forward to raising enough money to play in the nationals," said Dignam.

As of now, there are no courts on campus to practice or play on. Therefore, courts at Winners Athletic Club in Sunderland must be rented in order for the team to prepare.

The racquetball team is anxiously waiting Mullins Arena to open because it will contain eight courts, which UMass will use.

Due to the success of the team, Nadolny decided it would be a good idea to allow the people who supported the team to know the progress of it. Therefore, she decided with the help of some of her teammates to publish a by-weekly newsletter, titled Off the Wall.

The newsletter contains articles written by members of the team, and articles by the coach, president, and vice president (Bearman).

"I've had the experience of being on the UMass varsity women's tennis team," Nadolny said. "Now I'm playing on a club team. I'm impressed with our level of competition."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A day when expenditures, gifts and favors are in the spotlight. You may be tempted to play games where romance is concerned. Think twice! Mate admires your honesty.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): End the work week on a sound financial note by reiusing to send good money after bad. Emotions run high tonight; stay on an even keel. Rehashing an old argument would be a mistake.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Negotiating a fair deal may be difficult today. Charm and tact help you get your price. Your social life accelerates. Do not let a casual flirtation ruin a promising relationship.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A great day to show the generous side of your nature. After all, friendship is a two-way street; you will only get back what you put in! Plan a special treat for a mate. Be careful with heavy machinery today.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Do not be in too much of a hurry today or you could miss the chance to attend an interesting party. An older person may need your help. Travel is best postponed.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Slow down and enjoy the diversions the weekend provides. You sometimes rush past things that could be a lot of fun. Include family members in any celebrations you host.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Someone tries to persuade you to invest time or money in a risky venture. Resist the temptation. You would be jeopardizing savings you will need in the future.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A quiet day would suit you best. Avoid taking on more than you can handle. Romance is likely to be uppermost in your mind. A change of scenery proves very welcome.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You will profit from listening to others now. Your determination to have everything your own way could both cut into your fun and hinder romance. A loved one counsels caution.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You have a better outlook on the future now. You find yourself attracted to someone who normally would not be your type. Go ahead; take a chance on romance!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You should be able to take special pride in your actions now. Keep your money where you know it will be safe. A moment's carelessness could cause loss, confusion or delay.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Consider all of your options if your original plans for today fall through. Your pleasure will be doubled if you share an afternoon outing with a loved one. Let romance grow slowly.

Player of the game
University of Massachusetts guard Jim McCoy scored a season-high 31 points on 11-for-21 shooting (8-for-11 in the first half), including two key free throws in overtime which gave the Minutemen the lead they wouldn't relinquish. McCoy displayed his full arsenal on both sides of the floor, hitting jumpers from anywhere and everywhere while holding the Mountaineers' leading scorer Chris Leonard to just 12 points on 5-for-15 shooting.

Why UMass Won
The Minutemen hit 10 of 12 shots from the foul line and held the Mountaineers to just 3 of 13 from the field in the extra session to seal the victory. The Minutemen shot 45.6 percent from the field and held the Mountaineers to just 32.9 percent. Anton Brown hit a key 3-pointer with :40 remaining in the contest to give the Minutemen a two-point lead. But the big play came after West Virginia's Lawrence Pollard tied it up at 59 at :30 and UMass turned the ball over when Tony Barbee and Will Herndon stood in the way of the West Virginia offense in the closing seconds to send the game into overtime.

UMass assured share of title, beats West Virginia in OT

McCoy scores season-high 31 points to lead 74-69 win

By KEVIN C. KAUFMAN
Special to the Collegian

This is how games of this magnitude should go down.

Massachusetts and West Virginia, the Atlantic 10's front-runner and bridesmaid, respectively, gave all 10,570 Coliseum fans their money's worth, as they watched the Minutemen overcome a second half Mountaineer rally to chalk up a 74-69 overtime victory and put a stranglehold on the A-10 race.

UMass built as much as a 12-point lead in the second half after going in a the half with a 32-22 lead.

A Tracy Shelton 3-point shot with 6:36 left in the game brought the Mountaineers to within three at 52-49 and a Chris Leonard 3-pointer minutes later tied it up at 55-55.

Each team had a chance to ice the decision in the waning seconds.

Mountaineer forward Pervires Greene's two free throws tied the score at 59-59 with 30 seconds left. Then UMass inbounded the ball, but was forced to call a timeout with 26 seconds remaining because of the Mountaineers' full-court trapping defense.

Its next try to get the ball past half court was successful, but with 14 seconds left and victory for the Minutemen a bucket away, UMass guard Jim McCoy (a season-high 31 points) was called for traveling while driving the lane.

On the next possession, Marsalis Basey (10 points) passed off to Greene (13 points), who was stripped of the ball. Center Phil Wilson was the beneficiary of the loose ball, but was also stripped and failed to get a shot off.

"There's obviously a lot of contact," Leonard said. "Every game you watch, if it's tied up, the refs are going to overlook it unless it's really blatent because they want the teams to win and that's the way it should be."

It looked like the Mountaineers would continue on their roll as the extra session ensued.

Greene scored the Mountaineers' first four points of overtime, as the home team built a 64-61 lead and their first lead of the night.

Anton Brown (10 points) hit a three-pointer, though, to put the Minutemen up in the extra period at 66-65, as the lead changed hands four times in the ensuing possessions.

Basey hit a bucket off an inbounds play for the Mountaineers' 69th and last points. The Minutemen sank four free throws down the stretch to ice the victory.

"There was no knockout punch," said UMass coach John Calipari, whose 23rd victory tied the school mark for wins in a season. "We tried. They tried. We tried and what it was was a decision. There was no knockout and I think that shows a lot for our league.

"Jimmy McCoy played terrific," Calipari said. "They trapped him. They beat the heck out of him. They fouled him and they pushed. But he played. He never stopped and he made big free throws."

Minutewomen routed by G.W., 87-52

Home finale spoiled, Moran shines

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

George Washington University brought its travelling freshmen all-star show to the Curry Hicks Cage last night, much to the dismay of the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team, who got blown out 87-52.

The Colonial Women raised their record to 19-5 overall, 9-4 in the A-10. UMass drops to 4-21, 0-14 in the A-10.

Freshman, you say? Try these stats on for size:

- Darlene Saar, a 6-1 frosh, had her way with the UMass frontcourt, scoring 25 points and hauling down 18 rebounds, both of which are career highs.
- Debbie Hemery, whose fast breaks layups in the second half had the Minutewomen spinning, added 22 points, also a career high.
- Along with Saar, G.W. had 6-4 senior Mary Nordling and 6-5 freshman Martha Williams to run picks and screens of all types all game long.

"Our size was a big factor," said G.W. head coach Joe McKoewn. "Being able to go 6-5, 6-4, and 6-1 really helped."

UMass' Kim Kristofik, who at 6-1 is not only the Minutewomen's only six-footer, but also their leading scorer, picked up her third personal foul only 3:50 into the contest. She watched the next 19 minutes from the bench and finished with 10 points.

G.W. went on a 12-0 run to start the game, and the Minutewomen struggled to stay in the game for most of the first half. Then, with only 1:30 left in the half, UMass' Jen Moran, playing in her last game at the Cage, nailed a 3-pointer to cut the lead to 35-25.

Moran's 19 points (including 5 of 6 on 3-pointers) led the Minutewomen.

"I really didn't think about it [being the last game at the Cage]" she said. "It just ended up that they were open, so I took them."

It was streak time again as G.W. scored the last eight points of the half and the first four of the second half to open a 47-27 lead. UMass would get no closer and was on the wrong end of a 64-33 score with nine minutes left.

"The first two shots we had were wide open layups and both missed the rim," said UMass assistant coach Jill Rooney. "Right away we started out intimidated, and when we miss shots like that our kids have a tendency to get down on themselves."

GAME NOTES - It was 'Senior Night' at the Cage as Moran and Trish Riley were honored in a pre-game ceremony.

Late in the game Moran passed the 300 point mark for the season.

Riley's chronic back problems forced her to miss her second straight game.

The Minutewomen are off until they visit St. Joeseph's next week.

Students facing another tuition increase

Trustees accept GEO contract, vote to increase Fall tuition by 4 percent

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

In an abrupt change of stance, the University Board of Trustees voted Friday to raise tuition by four percent for next fall, a turnaround from a recommendation made by a sub-committee Thursday in Boston, which recommended not to raise tuition.

Trustee Chairperson Gordon Oakes said the recommendation was reviewed and committee members agreed they would rather not see tuition rise, but it would have to be discussed with the full board at Friday's meeting.

"[On Friday] we came to the conclusion that the four-percent increase was the least distasteful of the options before the board," Oakes said. "We're hoping the tuition increase will help offset worse situations.

"We can't do without an increase at this point," he said. "If we didn't raise the tuition and the State didn't come through with more funding, then there would be even bigger problems. It's a dilemma."

At the same meeting, the trustees unanimously ratified the Graduate Employee Organization contract, which has been tabled since a Feb. 6 trustee meeting.

"The meeting provided a mixed blessing," said GEO co-speaker Peter Underdown. "On the one hand, we have our contract and GEO will be a union. But now the problem of tuition increase has come up, and we're not happy about that."

Underdown said now that GEO's contract is no longer in dispute, they can concentrate on helping fight tuition increases.

"Now that we don't have to fight for our survival, we can focus our power and energy on our original goal: to further access to education for all," he said. "We are upset by the news of a raise in tuition, and will go to Boston if need be."

Oakes said the message a tuition increase would send to the Statehouse about higher education funding was the main issue of debate.

Some trustees felt that a tuition increase would in effect take pressure off the legislature to provide more funding for the school.

"We are not letting them off the hook," Oakes said. "The increase is too small for that. The idea is that we'll do our part here, but the state has got to do its part."

Oakes said no one truly favors the increase, but that it is necessary to maintain the quality of the University.

"In a perfect world, we would love not to recommend an increase, but a lot of time is spent figuring out how to do the least amount of damage to programs for the students," he said.

"We want to keep the school affordable, but we also want to maintain the quality. We want to make sure the degree students get from the University remain competetive."

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan said he is "absolutely, positively opposed" to the tuition raise.

Newnan said although the increase is less than any instituted in the last few years, it is the wrong move to make and is still an increase in student burden.

"What the University has done for years is ask the legislature for X amount of money, but let them know that if we don't get it from them we'll just raise tuition and fees," said Newnan.

"Until we show the statehouse we are not willing to do that, they're not going to take our requests seriously," he said.

Newnan said he thinks that with the four-percent increase in tuition, the statehouse will level-fund accordingly, thereby eradicating any potential good the increase would have done.

"I am very fearful that the students will be charged four percent more for nothing, and will not see any effect of the money," he said.

"Every time there is a fee increase, everyone says "it's a last resort, it's unfortunate, we need more state funding", but that doesn't exactly cut it," he continued.

Due to minor changes made in the contract as ratified by the trustees Friday, GEO will be holding a membership meeting on Wednesday at 5 p.m. in the Student Union Ballroom to re-ratify the contract with changes.

Fundraisers need 'novel' ideas

Library's future depends on staff, student commitments

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

With the release of a report detailing the deterioration of the University of Massachusetts Library System, students and staff are brainstorming to come up with novel ideas to raise money and awareness.

Payroll deductions for faculty and fundraiser benefits like a competitive "stairclimb" in the Tower Library are some of the ideas being discussed.

Established last May by the Faculty Senate, the Future of the Library Committee produced a report in January which said the University Library is buying hardly any new books while staff cutbacks, structural damage and the use of outdated technical equipment threaten the University's accreditation.

"The library's plight simply has to do with the state not providing enough money," said David Paroissien, the chair of the committee and a professor in the English department.

But the University "has yet to develop the commitment for fundraising support," he said.

In addition to attracting attention to the library's condition, fundraising projects will also strengthen the University's chances for receiving sorely-needed budget increases from the state, Paroissien said.

The report requested $1.1 million in emergency relief for Fiscal Year 1993 to "stave off disaster for another year."

At the next Faculty Senate meeting scheduled for later this month, a "comprehensive" fundraising plan is to be discussed along with a proposal for payroll deductions.

Climbing stairs for books

Dorothy Hayden, a librarian in technical services, has proposed the organization of a "stairclimb" in the Tower Library to bring attention and support to the continuing devastation of the University Library System.

By collecting pledges for the number of stairs climbed, students and staff could take part in a "morale booster" competition to publicize the library's plight.

"I think it is a real possibility not only as a potential source of much needed income, but also as a means of generating publicity and visibility and of mobilizing the campus community on its behalf," Hayden wrote in a memo last month.

The 28-story Tower has about 458 steps, according to Hayden.

Buy your own library chair

The Faculty Senate is also discussing the possibility of donor naming opportunities to raise money.

If one gave the library $10,000, for example, the person's name would grace the first floor meeting room.

One could also donate smaller amounts for the purchase of such badly-needed items as new tables, chairs, shelving and carpeting.

For $50,000, if this proposal goes into effect, the archives room could be named for a willing donor. About $20,000 would be used for new carpeting and furniture and the remaining $30,000 would be for the eventual replacement of the room.

"Pieces of paper"

One of Paroissien's major goals is to increase the library's visibility.

Compared to similar research schools like the University of Pennsylvania, he said the promotional and informational brochures about the UMass library are simply "a mass of pieces of paper."

At UPenn, Paroissien said, "There was nothing that wasn't beautifully designed and professional. What we've lacked so far is the will and the imagination."

Paroissien pointed to the informational pamphlet for the University's Hadley Farm as a good example of a

O'Brien meets with cultural center leaders

By EVELYN A DE JESUS
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Richard O'Brien and various administrators met Friday with students involved with last semesters' cultural center 'closings' to discuss actions taken by the administration on the students' demands and some possible solutions to end the conflict.

Students from the United Asia, Latin American and Josephine White Eagle cultural centers have said they "closed" their centers last semester to protest the University's "multicultural facade," and submitted a list of 22 demands to the Chancellor.

Chancellor O'Brien said that the purpose of the meeting was to, "discuss the proposals within a particular ethnic community."

"We are working in a restrictive environment. This is a matter of a community who wants to go through. What you want to do is the administration's [business] as a whole," O'Brien said.

"The center had turned as an illusion of racial tolerance," said Alexander Nguyen, who spoke for the United Asia Cultural Center. "We felt that we had been marginalized. We had acted in good faith when we founded the cultural center, but we had to sacrifice our center in order to get attention to the problem," said Nguyen.

"Colleges and universities, including UMass, should exercise a greater commitment to expanding enrollment of Black and Hispanic students, said Nguyen. He said close to 54 percent of CCEBMS students are not graduating.

"The numbers are shinking an unacceptable. Racial graffitti eurocentric curriculum denigrate who we are as a people," Nguyen said. He said these problems are national, not isolatd to UMass.

On the demands made by the students to the Inmates dying in Mass. prisons

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

FRAMINGHAM — Shortly before she died, Robin Peeler lay in her prison bed throwing up. Other prisoners saw blood in her vomit. She had been sick for weeks, but entered a prison infirmary two days before her death.

"She couldn't hold nothing down," said Darlest Chenevert, another inmate and a friend of Peeler's. "All she could eat was bread."

Peeler, who died Feb. 4, suffered from hepatitis-B, an infectious liver disease.

She was serving a one-year sentence for larceny, and had returned to the prison in late October after a 10-day stay at the state-run Lemuel Shattuck Hospital.

Inmates say her death was an example of how the Weld administration's efforts to save money by turning prison health care over to a private company poses a threat to their safety.

Peeler, 32, was one of four inmates who have died in state prisons since Emergency Medical Services Associates of Plantation, Fla., took over Jan. 1. The medical examiner's office is still waiting for test results from her autopsy to determine the cause of death.

Two other inmates died of heart conditions. Another 26-year-old inmate hanged himself at MCI-Cedar Junction. State officials said that, at the time of his death, Eric Booth was not considered suicidal, and therefore was not put on a suicide watch that would have required periodic checks.

"I know he wasn't checked often enough," said Rep. Barbara Gray, D-Framingham, who has launched an inquiry into the new prison health system. "They admitted they had checked him close to an hour before."

Last year, before EMSA, there were 28 deaths in state prisons. As Peeler lay dying, emergency staff at the prison failed to call an ambulance for at least five minutes, according to state officials.

"There appears to have been a communications breakdown between the physician and the correctional staff member," said Gerard Boyle, the Department of Corrections' associate commissioner for health care.

Inmates and nurses who used to work for the prison system charge that the Florida-based firm that took control of prison health care in January is cutting too many corners to save money.

But state officials say they are confident health care at the prisons will improve under EMSA. "The bottom line goal of this privatization effort is the delivery of a cost-effective, quality health care system," said Secretary of Public Safety Thomas C. Rapone. "We're confident that we are continuing to move towards that goal."

Books not finding way to UMass shelves

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Mel Carlson is a prolific reader.

As a staffer in the cataloguing department at the University Library, Carlson produced a personal three-page list representing a small sample of some of the tens of thousands of books the library just can't afford to buy.

Annual budget cuts have spurred the continual devastation of the library's resources — few books are being bought.

As a result, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, the second most expensive state school in the country has one of the lowest ranked libraries, according to the Association of Research Libraries.

"There is a kind of sadness about this list," Carlson said. "It was created out of my own reading pattern," adding that it concentrates on nonfiction books in the humanities which the University can't afford to purchase.

high-quality brochure.

Other projects

A 10-12 minute promotional video extolling the benefits of the University Library system is in the editing stage right now, Paroissien said.

Even some students, like David Knoch, a political science major, are working on a plan to deduct $1 per week from participating students' paychecks.

Dennis Scott, manager of the Faculty Club, has agreed to raise the price of red and white wine by $1 to raise money. Scott is also considering implementing the same fundraising plan at the Top of the Campus restaurant.

Still a sense of surrender

In his February memo to faculty and graduate students, Paroissien said he feels there is a sense of resignation and apathy among faculty and the administration as the University Library's ranking drops yearly and book acquisition funds dry up.

"Are we going to sit back in silence?" he writes. "This is our library that's under assault, our principal resource for teaching and research and the foundation of our endeavors in undergraduate and graduate education.

"Can we afford to acquiesce and lapse into quiet submission?"

A "laughing stock"

Compiled last summer, Carlson's list is "only a bare representation" of the tens of thousands of books similar research libraries annually order.

In 1988, the library purchased over 46,000 books. This year, the number has plummeted to 6,000.

With tastes ranging from Edgar Allen Poe to Paul de Man, Carlson's list shows some recently published books — automatic acquisitions just a few years ago — which are failing to get on the shelves of the University Library.

"If we don't have the core [collection], we are going to become a laughing stock," Carlson said. "One would have to question whether this University could retain its accreditation."

The purchasing power of the library to buy new materials has sunk about $9 million in the last two decades, according to the Future of the Library Committee report.

Few books per capita

Robert Lynch, associate director of Library Technical Services, said the considerably smaller Amherst College library purchases just under 12 books per student. At the University of Massachusetts, the library purchases a fraction of one book per student.

Although the University is much larger, Lynch argues that more books are needed since the University "has so many focuses and students." And if this deterioration should continue, he added, the future looks grim.

"A few years from now, an undergraduate will be trying to do a paper and [the books] won't be there," Lynch said. "If this should go on for a decade, the spirit of this University would be destroyed.

"I challenge anyone to point out a University which we compare ourselves to that supports its library system as poorly as our library system is supported," Lynch said.

Good-bye accreditation

Some observers worry that the University might lose its accreditation when the next evaluation team visits the University in 1988.

When the Commission on Institutions of Higher Education sent its team to check the campus in October of 1988 to make sure it was carrying out its educational objectives, the University Library was examined.

Although the Commission's team found the library to possess "tremendous strengths," the report forewarned today's current problems.

The report lamented the "volatile, unstable" library materials budget, the "heavily stretched" library staff and the poor audiovisual equipment.

In addition, the report said "major physical plant inadequacies" exist in both the main and branch libraries.

Some books on Carlson's list

- A People's Charter: The Pursuit of Rights in America by James MacGregor and Stewart Burns; 1991
- Science Matters: Achieving Scientific Literacy by Robert M. Hazen; 1991
- Fighting for Air: In the Trenches with Television News by Liz Trotta; 1991
- The Commanders by Bob Woodward; 1991
- Edgar A. Poe: Mournful and Never-Ending Remembrance by Kenneth Silverman; 1991
- Anne Sexton: A Biography by Diane Wood Middlebrook: 1991

administration the actions taken are the following:

- $9,000 remaining from the expenses satisfied of the UACC were reallocated to the United Asia Learning Resource Center.
- The UALRC now has a full-time secretary.
- There is a photocopier already there and there are four computers and a laser printer ordered.
- The administration has authorized the search of a permanent full-time counselor.
- The allocation of funds of the LACC to the Bilingual Collegiate Program could not be done because it was over budget. The figure was not given.
- The physical conditions of Wilder Hall, where BCP is located were evaluated by Beverly Nuckles, associate vice chancellor for Physical Planning. She is considering the possibility of remodeling Wilder or relocating BCP in the future.
- The administration will continue to provide funding for BCP's tutoring and mentoring program for 7th and 8th grade students in Holyoke.
- The Academic Matters Council evaluated the university's curriculum focusing on diversity courses. It recommended to identify qualified personnel to teach these courses and to investigate the possibilities of establishing a Latin American and Asian American studies program evolving into departments in the future.
- The Office of Human Relations already has coordinated a committee which has developed a draft policy regarding racial and other forms of harrasment. This policy will be discussed broadly during the Spring.
- "Public Safety and Housing Services have implemented a policy for responding to "hate graffitti". This protocol encourages criminal prosecution when appropiate."
- The administration was not able to meet students' demands for funding for New World Theater.

Alexander Nguyen discusses problems at a meeting on Friday with administrators.

Frederick Tillis said the administration could not make any commitment to funding, but that they would try. Nguyen informed the adminstration that due to budget reductions in New World Theater, there would be no original student productions next year.

Vice-Chancellor Jo-Anne Vanin and O'Brien said they were still working on demands for outreach positions for Native Americans and Latin Americans. Vanin said she "was confused on BCP requirements for additional staff."

The program has 5 professional and one clerical staff serving 340 students, compared to UALRC which has 1 professional and one clerical serving 363 students and CCEBMS which has 6 professionals and 2 clericals serving 485 students.

"I don't commit what I don't have, all depends on the budget for the fiscal years," said Vanin.

"We have seen such promises made for several years now, but none of them have been fulfilled as yet," said Elliott Monteverde-Torres, who spoke for the LACC. "We have still to be convinced of the administration's good faith," he said.

Reasons why we need to build a 200 foot wall around Morrissey

Michael Morrissey's "Why we need a 200 foot wall on the US-Mexican border" reads like a KKK recruitment pamphlet . . .as far as criminality is concerned, much of the US was stolen from Mexico in an imperialist war, and the rest from the Native Americans.

Look at the names of places in the whole "US" southwest! Is this a land of "English speakers?" . . . He calls this wall of hate a "source of pride", but it would be regarded by most of the world as a KKK inspired symbol of the highest levels of racism and chauvinism.

The only "tourists" who "will come to admire" it will be other racist Whites like him, European neo-Nazis and Afrikaners . . .but guess what? We're coming anyway. By any means necessary, the downtrodden of the earth will follow the flow of cash to escape poverty.

. . .It would do Mr. Morrissey well to remember that the "fat of this land" was taken from Mexico and other Latin American countries in the first place. He shouldn't criticize them for coming to this country in order to make a living off an economic system that depends on the economic exploitation of Mexico and the rest of the Third World. What he considers "social deviance" others would call Justice.

Michael, your ignorance appalls me . . .I realize that UMass is a couple of thousand miles away from the border, so the danger of you getting your throat slit by an offended Mexican isn't immediate, but you just can't use words and phrases like "some people", "Pedro Schmoe", "criminals" and "deviants" as general terms for Mexican immigrants (whether legal or illegal).

Doing so just shows what a pathetically sheltered life you must have. I, on the other hand, have lived and grown up in west Texas and New Mexico and I can tell you right now that you haven't the slightest clue about the situation down there

The employers of most Mexicans are rural United States farmers or builders who take advantage of the Mexicans' desperation to help with hard, heavy chores. You're not going to see an illegal alien working in a department store. They're all doing tedious [explicative]-work under the burning desert sun just so they can support the "12 children" you referred to (which, by the way, was also a very stereotyped remark).

Amanda Jost

. . .Many of the people who feel a need to enter the United States illegally (having been denied permission to do so legally) have come from countries such as El Salvador or Nicaragua, where, thanks to U.S. citizens, there has been tremendous political and economic hardship. Our government has consistently and covertly worked exclusively for its own interests, especially in this hemisphere, without any regard for the welfare of any other group or people. The "fat" of the land" of the United States consists also of the sweat and blood of oppressed people around the world.

. . .Your preoccupation with the fact that there are non-English speaking communities in this (very multicultural) country makes me cringe. . . .Another point you missed is that unemployment in this country is not due to illegal aliens. It is more closely related to our inability to compete with foreign countries.

Hizbollah softened up in article

In Hussein Ibish's article, "Israeli State Terrorism, 'Without Pity or Remorse'", the 'author' paints a blatantly one-sided and contextually inaccurate picture of the recent events in Lebanon. By hiding under the banner of the Third World Affairs page, which is really an exclusive editorial page, Mr. Ibish attempts to convince unsuspecting readers that his one-sided opinion is the only truly correct opinion.

The incident which Mr. Ibish describes is the culmination of a multitude of events which made the killing of Sayyid Abbas Musawi necessary for the security of northern Israel. While it is very sad that members of the terrorist's family died in the attack, I, for one, do not mourn his death.

Musawi's terrorist group, Hizbollah, has been responsible for deaths of innocent civilians in Lebanon and Israel. Hizbollah is anti-American, anti-Israeli and anti-Western. It's no wonder many people were not sad to learn of this renowned terrorist's death.

Mr. Ibish talks about Israeli forces going through U.N. lines, but does not mention the hostages held by Hizbollah, including Lt. Col. Higgins who, while working for the U.N. in Lebanon, was kidnapped, tortured and killed by the Hizbollah.

He feels it necessary to describe the history of Hizbollah, while only mentioning the Israeli action as if it were out of the blue against an unprovoked terrorist group. The truth is that Israel became involved in Lebanon well into that country's brutal civil war because of terrorist attacks on Israel as well as Katyushka rocket attacks against Israel by the PLO.

Of course, Mr. Ibish did not mention the five-year-old Israeli girl killed by one of Hizbollah's rockets in northern Israel.

I suggest that if Mr. Ibish wants to write about the events in Lebanon in the context in which they occur, that he leave out some of his personal animosities to the American and Israeli sides of this issue, and stick to the relevant facts, including some of those which he feels do not need to be mentioned because they might portray the Hizbollah as the brutal terrorist group that it really is.

Tired of 'crud' in recycling bins

All right, folks, I've held my peace long enough. I'm the Operations Supervisor for the Residential Recycling Program and I'm tired of seeing your crud in the recycling toters. Every week, my crew and I are forced to sort through all of the contaminated paper toters and pick out the crap that you keep throwing in there. Recycling is a simple concept. But, since some of you still seem confused, it's time to set aside any confusion you might have:

1) When the toters say mixed paper, they mean it. All we want is paper: newspaper, glossy paper, notebook paper, computer paper, etc. . .We do not want paper products. Paper plates are not recyclable. Paper cups are not recyclable. Kleenex are not recyclable. It's trash.

2) If you've got something that's got spooge all over it, throw it out. We can't recycle anything that's covered with grease, cheese or other unmentionable stains or bodily fluids. That stuff is trash.

3) If you have any envelopes with a mailing label or a plastic window, and you're not going to tear it off, throw the whole envelope in the trash. We don't want it. Throw it out.

4) If you're one of those butt-heads that keeps throwing condoms, tampons and food into the paper toters, stop. You're not impressing anybody. If you're trying to piss off some whacked out crunch-ball, you picked the wrong group. Go play your little game with one of the RSOs. I'm just trying to do my job to make some money.

All this crap in the recycling toters isn't just a hassle for me, it's a waste of your money. It costs almost $2,000 a year to sort through contaminated toters. One way or another, the only people paying for this are you and me.

Skeigh needs some new ideas

Are gay issues all you know how to write about, Ms. Skeigh? By now, everybody knows that you are an outspoken lesbian and have formed their own opinions of you, so please give it a rest. I don't even care so much anymore about what you have to say in your column, it's that every week you write about the same topic. There's more to life than expressing your views on being a lesbian. You may only write once a week, but you always write about the same thing! I've seen many people, not necessarily people I know, see your name on the Ed/Op page and groan. They then turn the page without reading your column because they already know what it will be about. People are getting tired of you — it's time to write about something else.

I'm not saying that I'm sick of having homosexuality "shoved down my throat". I'm saying that it's time to ease up a bit, find something new to write about.

Paying hoop fans had better stand and cheer

Sometimes I just don't understand how this University operates.

A week ago Saturday, I actually got to a basketball game before tip-off, and was able to get a seat — not in the balcony and not standing next to the concessions people. Actual prime STUDENT seating. Or so I thought.

In front of me were some people who did not appear to be students — mostly because they were older. But from my own classes and the like, I knew there are what is called "non-traditional students" and people who use their work experience and apply to what's going on the classroom.

But for some reason I knew they weren't the typical co-eds, because I know some non-traditional students, and they had more school spirit than these people.

If you've ever been to the Cage (who besides the editor in chief hasn't?) you know that the left side of the stands is reserved for the students who stand in line with their precious IDs to get that tiny ticket for the game.

The right side of the bleachers is for the "paying" customers (paying in quotes because the athletic fee on our semester bills is paying for those tickets) — the season ticket holders and die-hard locals who'd never miss a game. The people in front of me, were not the typical fan with a cut basketball on their head or red and white face paint. They sat very still, the woman in a skirt and the man in neatly pressed trousers and a nice argyle sweater.

Gayle Long

Get the picture? The other two guys in the aisle in front of me were ready and raring to go. They got a whole pizza, and were munching and cheering at the same time — exactly what I'd expect from a UMass fan.

Meanwhile, the tipoff was up and the students in my section stood up and began rooting for the team — in case you've been comatose for the past six months, UMass students do not sit during any of the action.

This is where the problems begin.

At first, there was 'the look.' The woman, still seated, turned and looked at her companion, who appeared ready to stand. But he flinched and remained seated. The woman said something to the effect of "stop them, Harold."

Poor Harold. There were about 200 students in front of them, and Harold didn't seem to have the ability to charm snakes. It seemed a doomed adventure.

But snottiness prevailed. When Harold, that dear man, didn't dare to approach the 200 fans chanting "Go, Go U, Go UMass," the woman did.

She began asking the people in front of her to sit down, and they didn't want to. They asked her if she wanted to switch seats, but she didn't — and here's the kicker:

She said she paid for the ticket, and she should be able to sit and see the game. What a crock.

I know not everyone was into seeing UMass play a team with only one win in the A-10, and the woman got her ticket because not enough students picked them up.

So, it's fine that people take advantage of a great game, but not for the students, who have to wait in line and then have someone who doesn't belong on their side tell them to sit down.

But someone should tell the people who sell these tickets to rope off the section or something — so all these people can all sit together and the students can cheer without intrusion.

Gayle Long is a Collegian columnist

Hullo again and thank you for flooding my life with your thoughts and opinions lately - where would I be without them? Just remember, long-windedness is ugly and just plain silly! Say it, don't spray it. Under 70 lines is almost a must at this point.

Buying American is clutch

Ever since George Bush tossed his cookies on national T.V. at the economic summit in Japan a few weeks ago, all we've heard about from the media and our leaders is "buy American", it's the right thing to do (actually that was Wilfred Brimley who said that).

Jeff Hojlo

Many of you may be sick of having people tell you what you can and can't buy or may feel guilty because you own a Japanese car (or other foreign product for that matter). I'm not going to tell that you should feel guilty because you shouldn't; you have just as much right to own a foreign car as anyone else.

What I am going to tell you is that (as you well know), we are mired in one of the worst recessions that this country has ever seen and that measures have to be taken by all of us to improve our economy.

Obviously, none of us can single-handedly cure the recession and certainly our government can't but I think that the buy American push is the best idea which has been proposed so far by anyone and that we should all try to follow this.

Some people, particularly foreigners, might be offended by this and might even go as far as to call the 'buy American' concept racist and isolationist.

I do not agree.

First of all, we are considered by most people to be the "Melting Pot" of the world so to say that our government is putting forth a racist notion is ridiculous. That's not to say that racism doesn't exist in this country because unfortunately, it does to a large extent but that doesn't mean that every pro-American slogan is anti-foreigner.

One may disagree with this and look to the recent assasination of Chukyo University President Iwao Matsuda and say that it happened because of this buy American thing and this supposed newfound hatred for anything or anyone Japanese. My theory is that this guy was killed by his wife because she caught him in bed with some lady or so she could collect life insurance, not by some guy who had lost his job and blamed the Japanese.

Secondly, I am not a believer in isolationalism and never have been. If our country adopted an isolationalist policy (as we've learned in the past) our economy would more or less stagnate and certainly wouldn't improve.

What we need right now is support for our country in these tough times, both economically and morally. Buying American would certainly give us this economic and moral boost.

Some of you may hitch at this and argue that the quality of American products is not as good as that of Japanese or other foreign products. This is a farce!

American products are continually recognized as among the best around the world (just check Consumer Reports). Some of your friends may try to tell you differently but have you ever really looked into the quality of our cars, or our clothes or anything for that matter?

Most of us (not all) supported our country when times were relatively good during the Persian Gulf War, if you're a true American, you'll support your country in tough times like these. Buy American.

Valentine's Day is over, knuckleheads, so get a life

Hey, hey, hey, UMass campus! Overwhelming popular demand has provided me with two weeks in a row of editorials if that's what you'd call it. Anyway, let's tear it up...

Don't think I don't see you all. Walking around with your head in the clouds, holding hands and giggling like there's nothing wrong. Well, I'm here to let you know you make me sick. That's right — voraciously ill. You carry on pawing each other in public, rubbing skin against skin, doing that weird thing with your lips. Y'all should be exterminated like roaches for that behavior.

You know who you are, but do you know who I am? I can see you perfectly well, strolling through the campus center, hand in hand, blocking my way so that I can't get in front of you.

I try to pass you at the Student Union steps but dammit it to [explicative], of course, there's another couple coming down the other side of the stairs so I have to bury my face in your posteriors as you walk up each step like you're walking to the altar — or to the electric chair — what the [explicative]'s the difference?

No, of course, you didn't see me. You two have stars in your eyes. Well, hey, I've got razor blades in my fists so get out the way!! The next couple that slows me down by blocking my path through the campus center is going to get their throats slit.

Tony Wescott

You couples in love just think the world is your flowerbed of oysters, don't you? How you love to boast about your lover to others: "My girlfriend and I are going to the movies tonight", "I'm very flattered, but I already have a boyfriend." Oh, how you all just love to be attached to each other at the wrists and ankles.

Do you actually enjoy being possessed by your boyfriend or girlfriend? And, don't you all have any other terms? I outgrew the terms boyfriend and girlfriend in sixth grade. Next time I hear a 20-year-old person refer to their lover as a boyfriend or a girlfriend, you too are going to get your throat slit. Except for my friend, who is dating someone in the seventh grade.

Seems to me there's quite a lack of terms out there for that certain someone you like to bounce off the walls. Sure, I've heard the term "significant other" used before. But that's such a pretentious and vile yuppie kind of term, anyone who utters it in any context in my presence had better have a jugular vein made out of sheet metal.

Anything else? Oh, yes, there's "better half," which is OK, because, in most cases, the person being referred to usually resembles a chewy, dripping shank of beef more than they do a person anyone else would consider writhing in Bearnaise with. Despite your magnitude, you lovers are a pretty pathetically simple-minded, unoriginal group of non-thinkers. I guess I'll take it upon myself to give y'all some new names for each other. You could be honest for once in your pointlessly vapid lives and refer to each other as your future ex-spouse. (I myself proudly call Winona Ryder my future ex-wife but for reasons that could never be put in print or recorded or documented in any way, shape or form, thank you).

Hmmmm... How about mutual user? Or is that a term already associated with computers? Symbiotic pal has a nice ring to it. It implies, no, make that sings, to me of companionship and mutual admiration and equality.

You know, things that you lovers all throw over for the virtues of possession and ownership and legal rights and expiration date and customer satisfaction that I hear in terms like my boyfriend, my girlfriend, my significant other, my better half, MY woman, MY guy, MY girl, MY squirrel, MY man, MY MY MY MINE MINE MINE MINE! I OWN YOU! You signed on the dotted line, you now you belong to ME! Do you all know that after being banished from the Garden of Eden by God, Adam and Eve decided to get married and the only person around in existence to prefrom the ceremony was none other than Satan himself? Yep, that's right. Signing a marriage license is signing a pact with the devil.

Come on then, already, you lovers. Kiss each other in public. Go ahead and tell everyone about your love slave who agrees to going to watch those damn movies with you. You'll be holding hands in the fires of [explicate], where your precious baby's fingers become transformed into carrot scrapers that whittle away at your sensitive skin for eternity, where your baby's knuckles are searing, molten spiked balls of lead that tear into your skin and slice your tendons and ligaments for eternity, where your baby's palms are sandpaper scraping back and forth against your heart for eternity while you can't help but perform the same acts upon them. Go on, I dare you to violate me. But don't be surprised if...

Bart chows tootsie chunks on Gameboy

By DAVID WEIZEL
Special to the Collegian

Bart Simpson's Escape From Camp Deadly
for Nintendo Gameboy
Acclaim, $30

Bart's on the Gameoy?! No way, Man! Yes way, and triple way cool Dude. Take a hike with Bart Simpson's Escape from Camp Deadly, and nature walks will never be the same again.

IronFist Burns, head counselor and Simpson hater extraordinaire, will make sure you have oodles of fun. And hey, if we lose a camper or two, namely you, Bart, who cares, right?

The first activity is Flag capture, and the sign says: TEAM A — Bart Simpson, TEAM B — EVERYBODY ELSE. Get the picture? Along the way, you've gotta defeat treehouse meanies like Blindside Bill, Rebound Rodney, and Slipshod Sam, whose names reveal their weak spots.

Lisa's loyally on hand with some snappy boomerangs and prest-o-change-o costume kits to aid your jail, er, camp break. Run for the hills, (although MT DEADLY is a pretty big hill, even for Simpson) and save yourself from a Summer in Hell.

This is a great game, even if you've never been to camp. The graphics are straight from the Simpsons cartoon and so's the soundtrack. And as an amazing touch the actual voices of Lisa and Bart have been lifted from the show and digitally recorded for the game!

When Bart gets knocked around you hear "Eat my Shorts!" and his famous last words "Ay Caramba!" When he bugs Lisa, her crisp "Stop it, Bart!" packs a wallop that'll grate your nerves raw.

In terms of gameplay, "Camp Deadly" is no walk in the woods. Since there's no continue option, once you lose you've really lost it for good. It's straight back to morning activity you go, even if you've made it all the way past dinnertime.

The "activities" are just what you'd expect from The Simpsons, like food fights, leaping headlong over rivers, avoiding annoying campers, beating up bullies, and dodging killer bees and hornets. Thank Butterfinger you've got the boomerangs, and occasional wardrobe changes, like the Bee-keeper, Football-player, and Nuclear waste disposal suits that Lisa gives you.

Once you get the hang of it, "Bart Simpson's Escape from Camp Deadly" can be quite addictive. And when you get to MT. DEADLY things get really steep.

Especially gross is how Bart gets power-ups! When a boomerang beans certain campers, they cough up tootsie-pop drops which Bart presumably snarfs up, adding to his energy level.

The only thing missing from this zany game is an "I Survived Camp Deadly" T-shirt. And who knows, fellow gameboids, some genius may be marketing one even as we speak.

Fame's rock-y road

By A.C. FOSTER
Collegian Staff

Fame and fortune are parts of everyone's dreams, and one area that attracts its share of dreamers trying to make it big is the music industry.

The place where people who are too lazy to get real jobs can go is the music industry. It's the place where you can record an album, make millions of dollars, and drive expensive sport cars to your video shoots where hundreds of adoring fans greet you with ecstatic screams.

Whatever one's stereotypes of the music world's professionals are, particularly those of rock and roll, the truth is that the music industry is becoming a place where only the most talented and hardest workers are making it. It's not easy to do by any means. Whether you're dreaming of making it in music or are simply just a big music listener, here are some facts that may change the way that you look at the music world.

As said before, success is not at all easy to come by, and as far as income goes, it can be months to years before a band sees any payoffs for their work. Studio costs have gone way up in recent years, and simply recording an album can put a group in debt if it doesn't sell well.

"The first thing new bands think about is simply getting signed. The standard record deal is one or two albums for an amount that varies according to the act and record company in question. However, the group doesn't "get money" as such when they sign, they get a budget to record their album(s) off of.

Let's say a new group has signed a two album contract for a $300,000 budget a piece. What this means is that the record company allows the band to spend $300,000 of the company's money in studio expenses to record an album. Out of the budget you also have to pay for production and engineering costs, which can easily take care of $75,000 or so right away. You must also remember that the company did not "give" you this money, they "loaned" it to you. Meaning that your budget of $300,000 has to be made back by the company on your record sales before you see a dime of them.

The record company will also cover video expenses, but again, if you spend $100,000 on a video, then the company will take that out of your sales, and must make it back before you see a piece of the action.

"Some astounding numbers are seen when you look at the fact that the video "Don't Cry" by Guns 'n' Roses cost roughly $1,000,000. However, when you're a well established group like GNR this is a drop in the bucket, as their latest duo-album sold a combined 7 million copies on its first DAY released.

Needless to say, there can be lots of clauses in contracts regarding budgets. Many of them will be along the lines of "if your first album goes platinum (sells one million copies) then the budget on your second album will be increased to $375,000." Royalty advances are other widely used clauses. This is when your record company advances you a certain amount of money, to do with as you please, and takes it out of future sales. If you're a young group that has been living in the gutter for years trying to land a deal, then an advance can feel like a fortune, but once again, it's not a gift from your label.

The other arrangement that can be made on a recording contract, besides a budget, is a fund. This is when

Jr. rock no longer too loud

By RICHARD BOURIE
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — Talk about being unappreciated in your own backyard.

J Mascis remembers a time in the mid-1980s when his band was banned from playing at Sheehan's Cafe and Pearl Street nightclub. The management at both Northampton clubs told him he played too loud, Mascis says.

Mascis, 26, no longer needs to concern himself with being shut out of local bars. Doors all over the world have opened wide to him and his band, Dinosaur, Jr.

The group has toured Europe and this country extensively. Australia and Japan as well. They haven't made the cover of Rolling Stone magazine yet, but they have made the cover of its counterparts in England — Melody Maker and New Musical Express.

Mascis sings and plays his guitar as loud as he wants and critics and fans love it.

The guitarist, who grew up and still lives in Amherst, is considered a giant in the world of college radio and "indie" rock. "Indie" rock is that branch of the genre disseminated among devotees by recordings that are independently produced and released. "Indie" artists manage to subvert the corporate recording monolith and develop on their own.

College radio stations are instrumental in spreading the divergent sounds of such artists.

The New York Times said Dinosaur Jr.s "gritty guitar-based music, played at brutally high volume on stage and given low-fi grainy production on records, has become the archetype of the independent rock sound, influencing an entire school" of lesser bands.

Since its founding in 1984, while Mascis was a student at the University of Massachusetts, the group has built a worldwide following through the issue of three independent albums.

Dinosaur Jr. is a three-man band, but Mascis deserves credit for the lion's share of the trio's creative output. He writes the songs and in the recording studio, he sings, plays guitar and produces the recordings, frequently laying down bass and drum tracks.

Mascis was into punk and hard-core music in his high school years. At the urging of a fellow student at UMass who had started a small label called "Homestead Records," Mascis' trio recorded an album in the basement of a Hadley home and began attracting fans.'

"The emphasis was on doing it yourself," he says, "then growing and getting bigger by yourself rather than waiting around to be discovered by a major label."

The group fulfilled a longtime dream by releasing its second album on SST, a respected "indie" label.

In the past two years, the group has made the move to a major label, recording two albums for Sire, a subsidiary of Warner Brothers.

Rolling Stone lauded the first, "Green Mind," for having "an unrestrained clamor that teeters on the edge of chaos..." It has sold more than 70,000 copies since its release in 1990.

A more recent release, "Whatever's Cool With Me" has sold about 40,000 copies and is still going strong, according to Sire.

With Dinosaur Jr. in a recent dormant spell, Mascis recetnly played a gig in New York City with members of Sonic Youth and Gumball in an eight-piece collaboration called the Velvet Monkeys.

It's all quite a leap from the UMass percussion ensemble whose leader associate music professor Bill Hanley, remembers Mascis well.

"He was an incredibly gifted guy back then," Hanley recalled. "He was light-years ahead of the other students."

Predictably, Mascis felt stifled, especially in the concert band at UMass.

"There was no creativity in that scene," Mascis remembered.

"People just seemed to be afraid of offending the leader. They wanted me in the marching band but I can't stand football. I used to go to some UMass games with my family but I couldn't imagine spending every weekend there."

He liked the percussion ensemble better. Hanley remembered letting Mascis cut loose on a Gene Krupa-style solo when the ensemble performed a standard piece of the repertoire.

"He was absolutley fabulous," Hanley said. "I remember the audience loving it." Mascis put to rest any notion that a drummer who concentrates on rock isn't capable of good jazz drumming, Hanley added.

Mascis took up the drums at age 11 and the guitar at 18, about the time he started the group. Among his influences were the drumming of the late John Bohnam of Led Zeppelin and the guitar artistry of Greg Sage of the Wipers, Ron Ashton of the Stooges and Tolling Stone Keith Richards and ex-Stone Mich Taylor.

the record company "gives" you an amount of money and lets you deal with covering your own studio expenses. If you receive a fund for $300,000, and are lucky enough to record an album for $250,000, then the band can keep the remaining $50,000. However, this is rare.

Once your album is recorded, and you are most likely substantially in debt to your label. Then, with any luck, your album begins to sell. If your good enough to get yourself back to "even" with your label then you'll start seeing some profits, but not much.

The typical new band will receive 12 percent royalty on sales. In other words, you get 12 percent of the sale when an album is sold. It's a rule of thumb that the record company will take 25 percent off the top for manufacturing costs. Furthermore, you will only receive your royalty rate on 80-85 percent of the albums sold. The remaining 15-20 percent is said to be kept for defective and promotional goods.

Once you've paid your dues as a young band, then, if you've proven to be a group who can sell albums, your future contracts will be upgraded. Your royalty rate can be increased. If you're really good you can receive signing bonuses, which are simply non-recoupable (can't be deducted from future sales) cash bonuses given to a group for doing nothing more than signing.

Only the proven acts receive these.

Some of the big time contracts involve Aerosmith, who recently signed with Columbia Records for roughly $19 million including $6 million in signing bonuses, as well as receiving a 25 percent royalty rate on 100 percent of total sales. Motley Crue signed with Elektra Records a four album deal reportedly worth $25 million, and Janet Jackson moved from A+M Records to Virgin Records for a $30 million deal. Artists reportedly on the verge of signing similiar type contracts are the Rolling Stones, Madonna, ZZ Top, and Guns n'Roses.

When looking at all the numbers, it's probably not surprising to discover that a lot of band's money does not come from record sales. A large profit area is merchandising, as this is a cash business to which your record label usually has no ties. Another big money maker, for veteran groups, are catalogs, which are older albums they have recorded. In the Aerosmith deal, Columbia paid the group $7.5 million for the continued use of their catalog.

These are important, and help bring immortality to the lifespan of albums as a new hit can help revitalize older albums. Bruce Springsteen's "Born in the USA" run brought several of his older albums back into the Billboard Top 200. For veterans, catalog sales account for approximately 40 percent of all sales.

Details of contracts vary with every act and company. While it's hard to compute just how much an act makes, as contracts are private transactions and you need to include merchandising, ticket prices and road income, the following is a list of artists who receive the "highest royalty and compensation packages from their labels," as listed in "Musician" magazine: 1) Michael Jackson, 2)Aerosmith, 3)Rolling Stones, 4)Janet Jackson, 5)Bruce Springsteen, 6)Motley Crue, 7)Fleetwood Mac, 8)Crosby, Stills Nash and Young, 9) Prince, 10)U2.

Another source of income are publishing companies. You can sell a part of the ownership of a song to one of these companies for some quick cash. Publishing companies recieve an amount of money every time a song is played, whether it's the radio or a juke box, thus it is easy for a group with a Top 40 hit to pull in six figures.

But while some of the numbers are big, most of them are not, and if you're a new band then your songs are all you have, so don't be too anxious to sell them. If a group is going to make it for the long run then chances are it'll take a little time, a little luck, and a whole lot of consistent, talented, hard work. So as you can see, life as a rock star, or more specifically getting there, may not be as easy as you had thought after all.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You can make sizable financial gains now by consolidating your resources and becoming more aggressive. A practical approach is vital. Romance brightens your evening.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You will serve your cause best by showing a cooperative spirit. Be on the lookout for an opportunity to join forces with a member of the opposite sex. Together, you can accomplish miracles!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Limit your socializing if money is in short supply. Remember someone who helped you at a critical time and reciprocate. New romance is on the horizon. Make a clean break with the past.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Someone may want to use you as a sounding board. Be frank. Solo efforts pay the biggest dividends now. A conversation with higher-ups could make your day. Look for ways to cut expenses.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Avoid making even minor mistakes where your financial interests are concerned. Purchase essentials only. Communications with a member of the opposite sex take on romantic overtones.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Give more thought to the location of your home and office. Make certian you are on sound financial footing before launching any new ventures. Stick to conventional business methods.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Employment matters may not be moving as fast as you would like. Do your best to remain patient and confident. Keep the menu simple if entertaining tonight. You could be late getting home.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): The financial picture will show definite improvement this week. Your artistic interests are stimulated by a loved one's encouragement. Romance moves in an exciting new direction.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): The emphasis is on maintaining your dignity and composure. Your help is needed in straightening out a delicate situation. You gain valuable insights from talking with new friends.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A friend from your past could reappear today. Entertain in the comfort of your own home instead of going to an expensive restaurant. Your mate is in an understanding mood.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A better day for winding up old projects than launching new ones. A friend's business trip could prove right on the money. The extra income will prove handy.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Financial progress may be slower than you would like. Avoid forcing the pace, especially where joint resources are involved. Very little stands in your way of achieving public acclaim.

All-smiles show for NRBQ

By MICHAEL LEVY
Collegian Staff

NRBQ
Pearl Street
Saturday, February 29

NRBQ kept a packed crowd jumping Saturday night, rocking hard and steady for a full hour and a half upstairs at Pearl Street. The show featured many of the band's standard songs along with rare originals and covers.

Pianist Terry Adams and Drummer Tom Ardolino were all smiles throughout most of the set, and bassist Joey Spampinato had a smirk which could easily become a grin at the sight of either of the two. Guitarist Al Anderson kept his usual serious expression, except for the occasion of Ardolino's drum solo, deemed as both rare and strange by Kevin Gadreaut, unofficial member of the small-yet-faithful fan group, "The Q-Balls."

Both Anderson and Spampinato looked on with laughter as Arlodino wailed on the drums. NRBQ (New Rhythm and Blues Quartet) performed other rarities, including "The Twist" and "Bye Bye Love," both sung by Anderson. The latter was far slower and more country sounding version than that made popular by the Everly Brothers. Though they hardly play either (the Q-Balls had never heard them in over 100 shows), the band understood its cue when Adams slammed the first two notes on the piano.

Standards performed included "It Was an Accident," "Ridin' in my Car," and "Wild Weekend," during which Adams reached over his clavinet keyboard just to yell "whew!" into his microphone

Also played were "Rocket in my Pocket," which featured a screaming guitar solo by Anderson. He did the same during "Get Rhythm," turning yes away from Adams momentarily. Sometimes it seems difficult to look away from Adams, as he moves from the piano, to the clavinet, to the trumpet, and back to the clavinet. Never sitting for more than a few moments, he seems to bang on the keyboards in a flip manor yet still strike the right notes.

All during the first few songs, Adams played the piano with his knees, fists and behind, sometimes sitting, sometimes standing, sometimes in between, sometimes on one of two knees.

Terry, who seems to call the songs one after another, continually stares into the crowd with a serious look, then goes back to shaking his head and shouting.

Ardolino kept a great beat throughout the show. Though holding the drum sticks and his wrists ever-so-loosely, he pounds the drums with striking intensity. Maybe he is forced to, as Adams continually calls for the stage crew to make his keyboard louder. Regardless, Ardolino plays a unique style, not always too fast (yet he is at times) but constant and present.

Spampinato seemed to never break a sweat, his fingers seeming relaxed most of the night. His voice reached its sweetest heights during "I Want You Bad."

Playing along side NRBQ was the Whole Wheat Horns, which included Terry Adam's brother, Don, on trombone and tambourine. He also filled in on drums when Ardolino took the spotlight for the fifties-sounding "Get a Job." Don Adams also sang lead once. The song was a very short mock hymn which showed great versatility in the voices of all band members involved.

After this song, Terry Adams asked the crowd for an immortal song to play. They came up with the questionably religious "Captain Lou," about wrestler Lou Albano. Next they did play something immortal — "Immortal," their latest album, Wild Weekend.

Opening for NRBQ was the Ray Mason Band, a tight three piece group. They played a short set, including mostly rock and blues songs.

Mason's voice seemed at times to resemble Neil Young in his most recent recordings — a loud and raspy sound. Both Mason and his bass player used rotting instruments, which I imagine they were quite attached to.

The audience at Pearl Street was treated to an almost constant flow of rhythm and blues Saturday night. I left wondering why there are no record companies backing NRBQ.

Mascis' guitar work and songwriting impresses critics, Rolling Stone said, "No band, here or abroad, better captures the epic college-radio sound of post-adolescent lethargy and emotional insecurity than Dinosaur Jr, the main reason being that most of Mascis' copious imitators lack his droll wit and pop heart."

Mascis gained these attributes partly by listening to radio and records since he was a kid. Mascis says he has collected about 1,200 albums, 500 singles, and 500 compact discs. His tastes have been influenced by such old favorrites as Deep Purple, Black Sabbath, Derek and the Dominos, Creedence Clearwater Revival, Aerosmith, Traffic and Blind Faith.

He also recognizes the contributions of groups in the lighter strata of popular music, like Abba and the Carpenters.

He appreciates both the singing and drumming of the late Karen Carpenter.

"Her voice hits something that's so depressing," Mascis said.

"People love 'depressing.' You can tell she was such a basket case." Carpenter died in 1983 of heart failure, a complication of the eating disorder anorexia nervosa.

Still, the critics' lavish praise somewhat confounds Mascis.

"I really don't understand that," he said. "It just doesn't seem to me that I'm doing anything that new or unusual. I guess a lot of bands seem to think so."

Nirvana seems to think so. The Seattle band shows the influence of Dinosaur Jr. concerts not so long ago.

"Now they're huge," Mascis said. "That puts things in a weird perspective."

In recent weeks, Nirvana has displaced U2 from the number one slot in the Billboard Top 100 and deservedly so, Mascis said. The album, "Nevermind" is platinum, having sold more tha a million units and Mascis called it the best of the year.

Next month, Dinosaur Jr will regroup in an Amherst basement of rehears new amterial. Mide Johnson, an Oregoan bassist formerly of a band called Snakepit, and drummer Emmet Jefferson Murphy III, known as Murph, also of Amherst, are the other members of the band. In the past the band has rehearsed in Vermont.

"We usually end up skiing and not practicing that much," Mascis admitted.

bars and winning the all-around with an overall score of 37.35.

"I did all right, I guess," a modest Marshall said. "What I'm really happy about is that we had another new lineup and we still won fairly easily. That shows our great depth."

Furtado also won two events, placing first in the beam with a score of 9.3 (the only '9' in that event for UMass) and first in the floor event, scoring a 9.5. Furtado also placed second in the bars with a 9.25 and second in the all-around (37.0). Demeo completed the sweep for the Minutewomen in the all-around with a 36.0.

"Everyone on this team loves to see Margaret [Furtado] do well because she works so hard in practice," Mitchell said. "She is so determined to win and is so mentally tough that she deserves to do as well as she has been doing all season long.

"It's gotten to the point where I know I can count on a solid meet from her every time," he said.

Placing fourth in the all-around for UMass was Jent (35.25). Jent also was strong in the vault with a 9.4, good enough for second place behind Marshall. Springfield's Tara Brady placed third with a 9.35.

The top Springfield competitor in the all-around was Kristen Coates, who had a 35.2 in the fifth spot.

"I had a good feeling when I stepped in the gym today," Mitchell said with a smile on his face. "I had my doubts during the week before the meet as to who would step in for our injured performers, but once we got going, I knew the girls had come to compete.

"As far as the rest of our meets go, we're really going to have to improve on a few things, namely the beam and the floor, in order to be competitive," Mitchell said. "What will help us in these events is the return of senior Kim Grady [broken foot] and junior Abby May [leg injury] next week.

There are some tough meets coming up. If we do hit all our routines though, we should do fine," he said.

Minutemen clinch first-ever regular season A-10 title

PITTSBURGH (AP) — Jim McCoy scored 18 points Sunday as Massachusetts clinched its first Atlantic 10 title with an 82-61 win over Duquesne.

The Minutemen also set a school record with their 24th victory, passing the mark set by the 1970-71 team that included Julius Erving.

It was Massachusetts' eighth consecutive win.

McCoy and William Herndon, who had 13 points, are Pittsburgh natives, as is Massachusetts coach John Calipari. It was the first time in any of their careers they won a game in Pittsburgh.

Five Minutemen were in double figures for the eighth time this season. Massachusetts improved to 24-4 and 12-3.

They have won 12 of 13 conference games since opening their league schedule with two losses.

Lou Roe came off the bench to score 13 points, Tony Barbee had 12 and Harper Williams added 10.

The Dukes were led by James Hargrove, who had 22 points, and Derrick Alston, who scored 13. Alston was held to a season-low two rebounds in 29 minutes, and Massachusetts held a 43-31 edge in rebounding.

The Minutemen led by 11 points at halftime but Duquesne went on a 9-1 run early in the second half to cut the margin to five. But Massachusetts answered with seven points, including four by Herndon.

Duquesne didn't get closer than nine points the rest of the game.

Duquesne, 12-14 and 5-10, has lost three consecutive games, all in the conference.

The win gives UMass a home game in the A-10 tournament finals if it advances that far.

The A-10 tourney begins this Saturday in Philadelphia, Pa. with the number eight and nine seeds playing for the right to face the Minutemen Sunday.

The finals are on Mar. 12, and will most likely be played in the confines of the small, but rowdy Curry Hicks Cage.

Massachusetts, which was ranked 26th in the latest Associated Press poll beat West Virginia in Morgantown this past Thursday 74-69 in overtime. At the time, the win ensured UMass at least a share of the Conference regular season title, until today when UMass wrapped it up.

Herndon scored 8 points in the first half to help the Minutemen open up a 40-29 halftime advantage. His ally-oop in the first half gave UMass a 21-13 lead, when it seemed as if the Dukes might be ready to make a run at the Minutemen.

Why UMass won

The Minutemen led by 11 at intermission after shooting 42 percent from the floor. In the second half, they cranked it up a notch, hitting 63 percent from the field, while holding Duquesne to a meager 42 percent for the game. When the Dukes missed, UMass' big men grabbed the boards. Three Minutemen hauled in 8 rebounds apiece. When Duquesne cut the UMass lead to 45-40, the Minutemen went on an 8-0 run which the Dukes never recovered from. Lou Roe came off the UMass bench to score 13 points, 6 more than the entire Duquesne bench.

UMass returns to the Cage Wednesday night to take on Rhode Island. The game has no bearing on the A-10 standings, as the Minutemen have clinched first place. Women Gymnasts win sixth

By JEFF HOJLO

At the Boyden Gymnastics Center last Wednesday night, the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics squad convincingly beat Div. 2 Springfield College, 182.2-177.9, to improve its record to 6-3.

Once again the "usuals" — Tammy Marshall, Margaret Furtado, and Gina Demeo came through in a big way for UMass head coach Alfie Mitchell — but it was the depth of the team that made the difference for the UMass gymnasts.

"There were a lot of people who had good meets — Angela Gent, Lisa-Beth Cronen — but the one who really stands out in my mind is [freshman] Erica Baum," Mitchell said. "Last week, Erin Klier broke a bone in her leg [probably out for the season] so that left a big gap for us, particularly on the bars.

"We really had no one else who had a solid routine in this event so Erica thought she'd give it a try and thankfully she came through with a 9.1. That's not a great score but it's pretty good for someone who hasn't been on the bars all year."

Marshall had an impressive meet again for UMass winning two out of the four events with a 9.7 in the vault, a 9.3 in the Candidates slight Mass. primary race

By CECI CONNOLLY

BOSTON — His opponents say Paul Tsongas has Massachusetts all sewn up. But the native son is casting his net much wider.

"All those people who said that we're regional? They were right," Tsongas told a band of supporters who greeted him at the airport Monday night. "But not this region alone — north, south, east and west."

Tsongas isn't the only one paying little attention to next week's primary, lost in the blur of Super Tuesday.

"The news here is what's not going on," said Ann Lewis, former political director of the Democratic National Committee.

Because Tsongas is the hometown favorite, the other democrats say it isn't worth their time or money to campaign here. They'd rather stump in states where they stand a chance.

On the GOP side, President Bush has the backing of every prominent Republican. But some analysts said conservative commentator Patrick Buchanan, who wounded Bush in New Hampshire, may try to do so again.

"Massachusetts often votes like New Hampshire," said pollster Gerry Chervinsky. "There's not a very aggressive Bush campaign going on in the state and Buchanan may see Massachusetts as a place where, with little personal time but some advertising, he might embarrass the president again."

Lewis, who also teaches at Harvard's Kennedy School of Government, said, "We should not be surprised the other candidates are not campaigning here."

But she is surprised by the lack of enthusiasm in a state where "politics is our second sport."

Now that every Democrat has conceded the Massachusetts primary to Tsongas, the expectations game is underway.

UMass students lobby legislators

Group travels to Washington to advocate financial aid

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

The four percent increase in tuition passed on Friday by the University's Board of Trustees has not deterred 45 students from traveling to Washington D.C. this week to lobby for student financial aid.

These students are part of Students Advocating Financial Aid, a registered student organization at UMass which is unique in the United States, according to Anne Marie Cervini, a sophomore pre-BDIC creative computer education major and SAFA member.

"SAFA's primary goal is that through financial aid, our nation will maintain a highly educated citizen," said Shawn Porter, a junior political science major and president of SAFA.

"Our other goal is to provide equal educational opportunity for everyone who has the grades, brains and will to go to school," said Porter.

SAFA has been training for this trip for two and a half months. Their goal is to meet with 150 Legislators by Wednesday. As of last night, they met with approximately 50.

SAFA members have two main goals which they hope to accomplish while in Washington. The first is to increase the Pell Grant, and the second is to have the Entitlement Program instituted.

The Entitlement Program would ensure that everyone who is eligible for the Pell Grant would receive the needed money. Even if the money was not there, the government would be required to find the money.

Currently, the highest Pell Grant given to a student at UMass in need is $2,400.

"If you don't make Pell Grants available for students, then you will have no students," said Cervini.

Tommorrow night SAFA members will attend a reception which all of the delegates from Massachusetts have been invited to. Senator Edward Kennedy (D-MA) and U.S. Representative John Olver have already confirmed their invitations, said Porter.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien, and Bert Batty, the University's director of financial aid, are also expected to attend the reception said Porter.

"SAFA is important because people on Capitol Hill don't get to see or hear students," said Ted Chambers, a student senator.

But Chambers said, "SAFA and SGA need to focus more on Beacon Hill because they have cut the state scholarship funding from $86 million to $22 million in the last three and a half years."

Board of Trustees ratifies GEO contract

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

After ratification by the Graduate Employee Organization membership and nearly a month of tabling by the University Board of Trustees, the GEO contract was ratified unanimously at a trustee meeting Friday in Worcester.

"We are really thankful that this wait is over, and for people's tremendous support throughout," said GEO co-speaker Emily Isaacs. "We always felt like we were a union, but no one has recognized us as such until now."

Two busloads of GEO members departed from the Amherst campus early Friday to attend the Worcester meeting. Isaacs said the members' presence made an impression on the trustees, and showed them that GEO members "are real people."

"I don't think the trustees have seen that many students at one of their meetings in a long time," Isaacs said. "The trustees are rather isolated from on-campus events like the strike, and we showed them that we are real people."

According to Trustee Chairperson Gordon Oakes, the GEO contract took approximately five minutes to resolve at Friday's meeting, with both Chancellor Richard O'Brien and University President E.K. Fretwell speaking in favor of ratification. He said both GEO and administration attorneys had been working hard at resolving the outstanding issues during the tabling period.

"The situation has been dealt with professionally all around," said Oakes. "There was no doubt in my mind that it would be resolved."

University Attorney William Searson, the lawyer for the administration negotiating team whose objections regarding the contract were responsible for tabling it at the first trustee meeting, was asked at Friday's meeting if he had any further problems with the contract, according to GEO co-speaker Peter Underdown. Searson said he had no more objections.

Isaacs said University students have "all been wonderful in tolerating constant GEO talk" and now "GEO can help them."

Underdown said, "GEO is now part of the changed

Tribunal says U.S. guilty of war crimes

By MADANMOHAN RAO
Collegian Staff

NEW YORK — This past Saturday in New York City, one of the largest independent worldwide investigations of war crimes in history culminated in one of the most unique of all war crimes tribunals.

After four hours of public presentation of testimony and evidence, a panel of international judges from two dozen countries pronounced U.S. officials George Bush, Dan Quayle, Richard Cheney, Colin Powell and Norman Schwarzkopf guilty on 19 charges of war crimes and crimes against peace and humanity, committed during the Gulf War.

The Tribunal was unique, because unlike most war crimes trials, which are conducted by governments, this was conducted by a group of private citizens from around the world acting independently.

This tribunal was the final hearing of 30 which were held since last May as part of an "International War Crimes Tribunal," conducted by former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark. The trials have been conducted in 20 countries worldwide.

Clark, who was in Iraq during the height of the coalition bombing, said, "Contrary to claims of a 'clean and surgical war,' the U.S. [and its allies] systematically and deliberately crippled the whole country."

"The bombing of hydroelectric projects, pumping stations, food storage centers and poultry and fishery centers, coupled with the economic sanctions, have destroyed any means that the Iraqis have of feeding themselves," he said.

"It was no war — it was one of the greatest slaughters in history," Clark said. He explained that in proportion to its population, Iraq lost a larger percentage of its people in 42 days of bombing than all the major participants in World War II.

Mohammed Khader, a resident of Baghdad who lost his wife and daughter in the bombing of the Al-Amariya civilian shelter, said, "I have waited for one year for some international body to investigate the bombing. What use are these international laws governing war if they are not obeyed or enforced?"

Additional testimony was provided by other individuals:

- Rene Dumont, a French agricultural specialist, said, "The U.S. embargo is killing the Iraqis by the thousands every week — and so is the silence of our people."
- Journalist Joyce Chediac screened video footage of the charred bodies of civilians, mostly women and children, being evacuated from the Al-Amariya bomb shelter.
- Bill Doares, a member of the Commission for Boy allegedly murders father

GRAFTON, VT (AP) — Friends and family, shocked by the shooting death of Arthur "Louie" Wright, say everything seemed fine between Wright and his 15-year-old son Matthew before the teenager allegedly killed his father during an argument over math grades.

"It hit me right between the eyes. I can't believe it happened," said Robert Lockerby, a lifelong friend of the 49-year-old victim.

Matthew Wright is scheduled to appear today for a hearing on first-degree murder charges in connection with the death Thursday. The boy allegedly fired a .22-caliber rifle at his father following an argument about the son's algebra grades.

The teenager was arraigned Friday as an adult on the charges in Brattleboro District Court, where his mother, Jean Wright, sat and wept. A hearing on the charge is scheduled Monday.

Louie Wright was a lifelong resident of Grafton, where his family had lived for generations. He owned a landscaping business and was a candidate for town selectman in the upcoming Town Meeting Day elections.

Friends say the elder Wright liked to boast about his adopted son's accomplishments, including bagging Grafton's second-largest deer last fall.

"Louie always bent over backwards for the kid," said Melvin Rice, a neighbor.

"You couldn't ask for a better son," said Rooney Gibbs, Matthew's uncle.

But that all changed Thursday when the pair began to argue after Matthew Wright returned home from school.

The argument escalated and the elder Wright supposedly threatened to leave the family and walked out of the house toward a tool shed, according to a police affidavit.

Matthew Wright told police he went to his bedroom, picked up a loaded bolt-action rifle and returned outside to find his father. The argument resumed and the teen fired one shot at a snow bank to the right of his father, according to the affidavit.

When the father told the boy that he would never dare shoot him, the youth turned the rifle on his father and fired, the affidavit said. A state medical examiner said the elder Wright died of three gunshot wounds to the head, stomach and arm about an hour and a half later.

"Matthew advised that he only intended to scare his father, not to shoot him," said Sgt. Myles Heffernan of the Vermont State Police.

Police said they were alerted to the shooting by Matthew Wright's friend, Joshua Clark, a classmate at Bellows Falls Union High School. Wright telephoned Clark, 15, to tell him what had happened, the affidavit said.

Clark told police that in the past Wright had talked of killing his parents as the two boys rode home on the school bus, according to the affidavit. He told police he thought Wright was joking.

Before fleeing, Wright allegedly left a note on the porch suggesting he had been kidnapped.

"We've got the kid. The house didn't burn so we got him instead," the note said, according to police.

Long-time UMass prof dies at 48

AMHERST – Sylvia Helen Forman, professor at the University of Massachusetts since 1972, and former chair of the department of anthropology, died Sunday.

Forman, 48, died at her home in Pelham. She was born in Tacoma Park, Maryland on Dec. 31, 1943.

Forman began teaching at the University in 1972 as an assistant professor of anthropology, with a concurrent appointment in the Center for International Education. In 1979 she became an associate professor and became a full professor in 1989.

Forman chaired the department of anthropology from 1984 to 1990. She also served on or directed many evaluation, oversight and search committees on campus. She chaired the Rules Committee of the Faculty Senate from 1974 to 1976. And over the past decade, she worked to strengthen the writing curriculum throughout the undergraduate program.

Forman received her Ph.D. in anthropology in 1972 from the University of California at Berkeley. She received her bachelor's degree (1968) and her master's degree (1969) from the same university.

Forman played a significant role in the American Anthropological Association, the national professional organization of anthropologists. She served on its Board of Directors from 1984 to 1988, and chaired the General Anthropology Division from 1987 to 1988, and the Committee on the Status of Women in Anthropology from 1976 to 1977. She was also co-founder of the Association for Feminist Anthropology.

Forman held professional consulting positions with the National Academy of Sciences, the Solar Energy Research Institute, and other organizations on issues of renewable energy technology, rural health care delivery and non-formal education.

Forman conducted several tours of field research in Andean Ecuador, which formed the basis of her doctoral dissertation, as well as a wide variety of published essays on human ecology, fertility, longevity and economic development in the Andean region.

Forman is survived by her husband, David Litwak of Pelham, her surrogate parents, Edith and David Jenkins of San Francisco, California, her sister, Rebecca Havard of Highland, Maryland, and her father, Sidney Forman of Delray Beach, Florida.

Calling hours are at the Forman home, 12 Country Lane, Pelham, noon to 10 p.m. daily through Thursday, March 5. A memorial service will be held Thursday, March 12, at 1:30 p.m. in Memorial Hall on the campus of the University of Massachusetts.

Memorial gifts may be made to the Sylvia Forman Third World Scholarship Fund, a fund Forman established to provide scholarships for Third World graduate students to study at the University of Massachusetts. Contributions to the fund may be sent to the anthropology department in Machmer Hall.

Restaurants chip in to help feed homeless

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

People dining today at local restaurants participating in the fourth "Piece of the Pie" restaurant benefit for the Western Massachusetts Food Bank will not only fill their own stomachs but those of the hungry and homeless as well.

This year 61 restaurants in Western Massachusetts will donate 10 percent of their revenue for the day — including breakfast, lunch and dinner — to the Western Massachusetts Food Bank, said the Food Bank's Director of Development, James Buell.

The Western Massachusetts Food Bank is part of a national organization which distributes foods to local agencies which give the food to people without homes.

"The idea of ["Piece of the Pie"] is to get 10 percent more people to go to the restaurants — this way the Food Bank benefits and the restaurants don't lose money for the day," said Buell.

He said he was very pleased with the amount of restaurants participating in "Piece of the Pie," considering the fact that many restaurants have gone out of business and the restaurant business has not been very prosperous this year.

"We have 15 new restaurants participating in 'Piece of the Pie' this year, which brings our total number of restaurants up six from 1990," Buell said.

The event, begun in 1988 by The Valley Advocate, wasn't held in 1991 to avoid interfering with The Food Bank's participation in the "Taste of Northampton," according to Buell.

The goal for "Piece of the Pie" in 1992 is to raise between $9,000 and $10,000, which is about one-tenth of the amount The Food Bank needs to raise in contributions during the year for operating expenses, said Buell.

Buell said, "Piece of the Pie" only raised $8,000 in 1990 because of an ice storm which prevented people from going out. Buell said he's hoping for good weather during this year's event.

Many restaurants from Western Massachusetts and Greater Hartford support the Food Bank, which distributed 2.3 million pounds of food in 1991 to about 200,000 people.

Jack Radetsky, owner of Bart's Ice Cream and Frozen Yogurt, said it is UM prof says lesbians face biases in sports

By WENDY JOHNSON
Collegian Correspondent

Because of widespread discrimination both within sports and in society as a whole, lesbians and gays participating in sports need a network of support to allow them to compete successfully, according to a University of Massachusetts education professor.

Professor Pat Griffin gave a speech titled "Lesbians and Sports — the Good, the Bad and the Ugly," at last Thursday's Brown Bag Lunch seminar, sponsored by the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns.

Griffin said there are thousands of gays and lesbians in mainstream sports, but they "must remain very closeted," due to homophobia and heterosexism coming not only from other teammates, but coaches and parents as well.

Griffin labeled the homophobia within the sporting community as "the bad and ugly." Examples of the "bad" included what Griffin called "silence, denial and apology."

"When Billie Jean King's [sexual orientation] was made public, the rest of the sporting community wanted to keep it as quiet as possible and go back to business," Griffin said. "It's an expectation in sports that lesbians will stay in the closet and stay silent and that [anyone else who] knows their secret will keep silent."

"Apology takes place when women find themselves apologizing for being athletic. They must still act and appear feminine. Many recruiters emphasize the feminine qualities of a women's team," Griffin said.

As an example of apology, Griffin showed the audience a picture of the recruiting catalog for the DePaul Women's Basketball team. The brochure's only picture of the women playing ball contained this apology: "Our girls are competitors on the court, and ladies everywhere else." The rest of the pictures of this team were of the players wearing dresses and high heels.

Griffin said, "If women love sports, they must apologize for it by appearing feminine and acceptable. But make no mistakes — "feminine" is not about being feminine. It is a code word for heterosexual."

An aspect of what Griffin labels "the ugly" is what she calls "the cloaking device: to avoid the stigma that the coach could be a lesbian. . . and possibly molest the players, there has been a decline of female coaches for women's teams. I have heard of male coaches [making advances towards a team member], but never of sexual harassment involving a lesbian

Relaxing for credits: take a class in Yoga

ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Correspondent

Editor's Note: This is one in a series of articles examining unique and innovative courses taught at the University.

A lot of people hear the word Yoga and think, "Oh, yeah. That's where you kinda sit back and zone out, chant some nonsense. Far out."

The art of Kundalini Yoga, taught at the University of Massachusetts, involves a lot of different things and it's a lot more rigorous than one might think.

One of the first things the class focuses on is breathing. The way one breathes has a very strong correlation to the body's ability to feel relaxed.

Yoga emphasizes diaphramatic breathing (breathing from the diaphragm) and incorporates this kind of breathing into all of its exercises.

Guru Nam Khalsa speaks of the benefits of the Kundalini Yoga exercises which are taught in the class.

"They increase awareness on many subtle levels. It helps develop an appreciation of human power," Khalsa said of the benefits of Yoga.

"Through it we can break away from old messages we have that may be harmful," he said, "and realize who we really are and what we're for."

Rhythmatic stretching exercises are another important part of Kundalini Yoga. The exercises are often done at rapid pace. It really gets the body working hard and yet, done with the diaphramatic breathing, it's a great tension reliever.

Meditation is part of Kundalini Yoga, too. It greatly enhances one's awareness and ability to concentrate.

Meditation can be done by sitting and lying silently, focusing on breathing and a thought which is positive and relaxing. Another way is to repeat a word or phrase (called a "mantra") over and over while the body is at rest. It may seem strange at first, but this repetition really helps the mind to focus and let go of unwanted thoughts.

Singing, accompanied by acoustic guitar or autoharp, is also done in the class. In fact, each class ends with a soothing song that speaks of peace and beauty within people.

The course has two instructors, Guru Nam Khalsa and Siri Nam Khalsa. They both practice the total Yoga lifestyle which includes a certain diet, exercises and modes of thinking.

You never quite realize how much tension can be built up in a busy day until you have the opportunity to relax completely, as done in this class.

It's really a complete physical and spiritual experience. If interested, don't miss out.

The class is offered in the Fall and Spring semesters and is designated as PE 43.

"He's got to do better than 60 percent," state Gov. Bill Clinton's state coordinator, Rep. Richard Moore.

Moore and other opponents say Tsongas must at least meet the 57 percent won by former Gov. Michael Dukakis in the 1988 primary.

"We would expect him to win in the same manner that (Sen. Tom) Harkin won in Iowa," said Mike Bourbeau, state campaign managewr for Jerry Brown.

Harkin took nearly 80 percent of the vote in his home state's caucuses. His campaign manager agreed Tsongas ought to perform just as well in his home state.

But Chervinsky, president of KRC Communications, said 80 percent was an absurd goal and even 57 percent was probably high.

"This is all ridiculous, setting the expectations," Tsongas said at the small airport rally. "Why don't they just go ahead with their own issues?"

Much will depend on today's results in key states like Maryland, Colorado and Washington. If Tsongas wins any of those, he will lay aside arguments he is a regional candidate.

Despite the lack of active campaigning, party leaders say Massachussetts is important because more than 100 convention delegates are at stake.

Several Democrats said their goal is to win at least 15 percent of the vote in individual congressional districts, which would qualify them for delegates.

Secretary of State Michael Connolly said he expects a slightly larger turnout than the 50 percent that voted in the Massachusettspresidential primary four years ago.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist, and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Editorial Policy

Two weeks is a long time to wait for news.

There are basically two kinds of writing in newspapers: the editorial and the news story. An editorial is an opinion piece, while a news story is an impartial communication of something that has happened or is happening.

In the early 1970s, a number of women seeking guarantees that editorials and news stories relevant to their community were not ignored occupied the Collegian offices and demanded a Women's Issues page. While the concept of a page is one way to accomplish parity, perhaps it isn't the only way.

Why can't an editorial about women's issues be included in the editorial page along with everyone else's? A woman's opinion is no less important than anyone else's.

Why can't a news article about women's issues be included in the regular news section with the rest of the news? Again, these stories are no less important than the others. Besides, women's issues effect the entire female-male population. Articles concerning women's issues should appear in a forum where they are addressed by both men and women.

And why should the community have to wait two weeks to read about issues concerning women?

These questions are what prompted the Board of Editors to instigate the women's issues experiment.

Briefly, instead of news articles on women's issues being published on a separate page every two weeks, those same articles will be available in the news section. In addition, to insure the community's editorial voice, the women's issues editor will provide a column for the editorial/opinion page every Tuesday.

This way, issues concerning women are covered regularly, each day they occur, not just every two weeks.

Again, this is only an experiment. At the end of this semester, the entire Collegian staff will vote to determine if the change will become permanent.

Hopefully this will help us to better cover women's issues and to better provide information important to the women's community. If anyone has any questions about this experiment, please feel free to come down and talk with the editor-in-chief, who will be glad to meet with you.

Unsigned editorials reflect the collective views of the Collegian.

Faster isn't always better

Mike Levy

Did you hear about the new scientific breakthrough? An atom transmitter has been created which can move people and things about, much like we see when Scotty "beams" somebody on "Star Trek." What potential it has! Think of all the time saved when you can go anywhere and do anything simply by pressing a button. They are very expensive now, but the price will surely drop and, I am quite certain, every home will have one by 1998.

If you believed this than I truly feel bad for you. No, this does not exist, but what if it did? Would people really save time? It would surely be marketed that way: "Get to work in minutes! Forget that awful traffic! Visit your Grandmother every Sunday!" This sound great, but would it actually make lives better?

What has become of our society with the advent of the computer, cellular telephone and fax machine? Have we really saved time by using these "time saving" devices? My personal life may be boring to you, but allow me to use my father as an example.

Dad gets up for work at 1:00 a.m. Monday through Friday, and had done so with great regularity for 20 years. He leaves his Manhattan business (it really isn't too exotic — he buys and sells fish) with the rush hour traffic in the afternoon. That was until recently. Now he can leave two hours early, take calls from his car, and give and receive documents from his mini-office in the basement with his fax machine. This all allows him extra time to get away from New York, but the separation from home and work has become a fine line.

Years ago, when my father got home he was through. He could put up his legs and nap all he wanted. Now he can be suddenly transported to the world of fish simply by walking downstairs. We really have not spoken about this, but it looks as if his work is intruding on his personal life. Modern time saving technology has helped him do this. When there is an important document to see, instead of waiting until the following day, my father might have it sent by Linda or Lana, still pushing the paperwork in the office. Now it seems that there is a constant flow of work, instead of just during those hours set aside for it.

This could be worse for others who have less control over their jobs. Middle managers for large corporations may be sent papers constantly, as long as their superiors have no objection to putting them to work at night. This is certainly possible when such managers are paid by salary; paid by the week instead of by the hour. The telephones in their offices now have new capabilities, such as automatic callback. This is a nice feature, which has the telephone automatically call a busy number until it is free. The person on the other line hangs up and then gets another call immediately.

What implications does this have for office life? Will businesses simply say, "Well, things are done faster now. Go home three hours early." No. There is instead a steady stream of work. Telephone operators can be monitored by a computer to be evaluated on call length. If they take a short break or maybe even take the time to be more friendly than "thank you for calling, Ma'am," then they will be disciplined. Who is this saving time for? Certainly not the average worker, at the mercy of the employer. Is it the community in general who benefits, having things done quicker and cheaper? I think not. Instead businesses use technology to reduce staff and lower costs. How can unemployment not rise when everything is so very "fast and efficient?" Following this cycle further, businesses gain another advantage by the increased job competition. They can be more selective and pay less, maybe even institute policies which infringe on workers rights, such as compulsory drug testing. They can even drive their workers harder, give them fax machines and cellular phones, and reduce staff some more. Who will complain or leave their jobs when they went through months of torment seeking the one they have?

So maybe I will pass on the atom transfer gadget when it hits the stores. Getting there quickly is nice, but I like the scenic route.

Administrators support equality

While on campus on Feb. 24, I was pleased to read in the Collegian the letter from interim Dean of Students Sharon Kipetz and interim Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Jo-Anne T. Vanin, who spoke with clear voices against the recent vandalism experienced by the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns.

As they took a strong stand against violence and harassment of any kind, they provided administrative leadership so necessary in order to promote respect and dignity for all those within the campus community and beyond.

In my position as Northeast Regional Director of Federaton of Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays (P-FLAG), Inc., I am well aware of the discrimination experienced by members of the gay, lesbian and bisexual communities and their families and the need for positive influences by those in leadership roles in order to eliminate the destructive violence and harassment so common in our educational institutions and in the greater society.

UMass is fortunate to have administrators who are willing to take a stand in support of equality and against violence and harassment of any kind.

You should love it or leave it

In response to Lorrie Cozzens' recent editorial, we have this message: If you don't like it here, pack your things and go back to wherever you transferred from. We do not need any more pot shots aimed at the University.

Sweeping generalizations such as "Nothing matters here anymore," are simply negative comments that offer no solutions to the many problems presently plaguing UMass. What we need in this difficult time is suggestions and solutions, rather than angry criticism.

Ms. Cozzens, if you are attending college to be surrounded by pristine shrubbery and polished brass toilet handles, maybe you should reassess what you want out of college. Perhaps your weakness in character explains your inability to shine as an individual.

Using physical strength to dominate women is not romantic

Stacy Malone

In today's society the number of women surpass the number of men, yet it is men who dominate the world. They dominate our government, workplace, educational staffs and most other aspects of the lives of women. Why must so many men also try to dominate the physical bodies of women? What makes many men use their dominating strength to control the actions of women? Look around you. Did the woman next to you really get that bruise from banging her arm on a desk or had some man been brutally grasping it? Is it possible for your friend to fall down the stairs every weekend she spends with her boyfriend? Do the women in your life flinch when you lend them a helping hand?

My friend was once involved in a relationship with a man for six months. He was cute and outgoing; the typical college guy. "The relationship began great. He was sweet and romantic. He made everything revolve around me." It sounded too good to be true, because he was so eager to please her and make her happy.

It wasn't until two months into the relationship that she saw a different side of him. A side of him that wasn't sweet or romantic, but selfish and frightening. "We were fooling around and I didn't want it to progress any further. He didn't hit me, but physically he was hurting me." He didn't need to outrightly punch her in the face to be physically abusive. The way he was trying to control her was enough to leave bruises on her body and heart.

He wasn't being romantic by using his physical strength to dominate her body. He wasn't being sweet by making her feel inferior. Soon the only thing that began to revolve around her was the pain he inflicted on her. Now he was only able to make her happy by not being there.

As she spoke of the last four months of their relationship she was sure to point out that "sometimes he was awesome to be around, but usually when we would meet it would end in a an argument". He would become very pushy and hold her tightly. He would often times slam her up against a wall and become so abusive to her that he would leave bruises all over her. Does this still sound like the kind of guy most women you know would want to date here at UMass?

A lot of people wondered where all of her bruises came from, but many knew. How could they not! Several people would interrupt when they heard the fighting. They would calm him down and make him leave her alone. Now if it took a several people to to stop him, how could a single woman overpower his physical strength? She couldn't.

The people that knew her boyfriend was abusing her would always ask her to break up with him. Her answer was simply, "No. He really likes me." She honestly believed this, because of his sincere apologizes and retreat to his old romantic ways after he saw he had hurt her. Those who didn't know her boyfriend was abusing her just assumed that she was very clumsy.

As the months passed, their relationship looked less like the ideal relationship that she had once enjoyed. Finally the point arrived where she realized the strongest feeling she had for him was fear. "I became so afraid of him. I was afraid to be with him or even near him." She became involved with someone who wanted to make her happy. What happened to that guy?

It is amazing that such an ideal relationship became so destructive, how do you end such a relationship? Realistically a man who tries to control a woman's life isn't going to just let her walk away. And he didn't. She tried several times during their relationship to end it, but he wouldn't settle for that. His romantic tendencies emotionally pulled her back as his physical strength forced her to stay.

She was finally able to break up him during winter break. She went home to her family and they stayed with her when she called him. She wouldn't take it anymore. It was over. Having her family there made her feel safe and protected from his hands, his eyes, his physical dominance. Her family lent her a helping hand. She flinched, but grasped on for dear life.

Clemens finally shows at camp

By MICHAEL BEZDEK
Associated Press

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. — Roger Clemens, who created a week of headlines by not reporting with other players to the Boston Red Sox spring training camp, arrived Monday saying he had stayed away to avoid media attention.

Clemens, unflinching under the weighty irony of the moment as he addressed about 30 reporters and photographers, then drew further attention as he began to practice with an all-white baseball glove.

"The reason I was home for two weeks. . . doing what I needed to pitch down here, is so I didn't have to do what I'm doing with you all right now," he said.

Asked repeatedly why he had not given new manager Butch Hobson a call to let him know he would not arrive with the other players, he said it was not an issue and he would not discuss it.

Hobson, who encountered Clemens early in the morning before practice and then jogged with him, said Clemens had apologized to him during their run.

"He apologized," Hobson said.

Clemens had said he would arrive before the Baseball Agreement reporting deadline of Wednesday, after which he could have been fined. He did not call to say he would not report with other pitchers and catchers Feb. 24, nor to say he would not be on hand for the first full team workout Saturday.

Hobson had said all along he was disappointed Clemens had not called. He would not give the context of Clemen's apology. Whether it was for being later than the other players, for not calling, or for just causing an uproar, it was enough for Hobson.

"Roger and I got the situation taken care of," he said.

important to play a role in community sponsored programs like "Piece of the Pie".

"Bart's is a place where families come for a positive treat and during these hard times I feel it is important to give something back to the community," said Radetsky.

coach."

More of this "ugliness" takes the form of "direct attacks on lesbians," says Griffin. At one time, a Penn State coach told prospective players that she didn't allow alcohol, drugs or lesbians on her team." When this became known nationwide last spring, "it sparked enough controversy to force Penn State to enact a non-discrimination policy," Griffin said.

To counteract the "bad and the ugly," there is some "good."

"There is an established gay and lesbian sub-culture within mainstream sports, and created out of this is a thriving alternative lesbian and gay sport network, such as a lesbian softball league and the Gay Games," said Griffin.

Griffin said, "In 1990, athletes from all over the world competed in the biggest sporting event in the world, the Gay Games. Over 7,000 people participated, but did you read about it in any magazines or newspapers?"

Having a network of support within the gay and lesbian athletic community is important, Griffin says, because it "provides positive role models, self-confidence, pride, and social "family ties" — especially if someone's real family rejects them because of their sexuality."

Harriet Tubman is my heroine

By SARAH LEVESQUE
Collegian Correspondent

When children are asked, "Who is your hero?" (or when the questioner is hip, "your heroine?"), I wonder how many children, of any race or background, would say Harriet Tubman was their heroine.

I do know a diverse group of children who just might astonish the adult asking that well worn question and answer, not "Michelangelo" of the Teenage Mutant Ninja Turtles or "Hulk Hogan," but a defiant, "Harriet Tubman is my heroine. Who's yours?"

Chances are that the aforementioned child saw a truly delightful Underground Railway Theater (URT) production called Are You Ready My Sister? and was one of the seventy or more neatly combed, hatted and hair-banded children that filled the seats of Bowker Auditorium Sunday, March 1 at 2 p.m.

As the audience chose their seats, a little girl in the row in front of me explained why she wasn't choosey about the central most seat and that it didn't matter where she sat. "It doesn't matter who's in the middle because everybody's pretty."

"Cooperation between the races," a theme from the production, was already in action on the most fundamental level—"Everybody is pretty. All races are beautiful. No one is better than anyone else."

The audience expanded and changed shape like one of those "magic capsules" becoming a spongy dinosaur when left in water. I noted the pin a girl nearby wore: "Stop Acid Rain!"

Children around me discussed the props on stage. The backdrop was a symbolic quilt with geometric designs and a border of linked arms interwoven with colorful trains. "That's the sun and there are the stars down there because the slaves ran away during the night and during the day," one child was overheard telling his friend.

The show began with a clever twist. A woman from the audience begins to have a coughing fit and the Quaker woman character helps her to a seat on the stage. We soon discover that this "homeless" woman who says she spent the night in the auditorium is our beloved "conductor" of the Underground Railroad.

The Quaker woman, played by Debra Wise, asks the audience for ideas on how to help Tubman, played by Merle Perkins, with her current situation, for even the U.S. army has neglected her. It offers her no pension for the service of being a spy during the civil war.

It is this combination/confrontation of modern politics mixed with history and artistic expression, that offers the audience, no matter how old one is, an enticing brew. This creative, multi-media "historical adventure story" designed for first graders to sixth graders should be a mandatory field trip for everyone.

The life of Harriet Tubman, known as the "Moses" of her people, who helped over 300 slaves escape, is told not only through Wise and Perkins, but also through puppetry, projections and songs, most being spirituals from the slave era.

The backdrop of the giant quilt is a symbolic replica of Tubman's wedding quilt that she gave to the Quaker woman who first helped her to escape. The quilt is the ultimate metaphor of the network of women who were involved in the Underground Railroad, and in the bigger sense, the sisterhood and universal struggle of women.

"Are You Ready My Sister", written and directed by URT Artistic Director Wes Sanders, not only ties in the issues of helping one another, the homeless, and the evils of slavery, but also the women's suffrage movement in the U.S.

My favorite character out of the four different Quaker women that Wise brings to life on stage is Lucretia Mott, a woman gone bloomer-wearing suffragette. This wonderful character is both comical and inspiring. The scene between her and Harriet Tubman added depth to the show and was my favorite scene.

Perkins and Wise complimented each other as performers and the dramatic blend of their two strong, soulful voices easily inspired the audience to sing along. "I'm going to ride the chariot in the morning Lord..."

The character of Tubman at one point introduces the audience to a not-so-familiar song, a kind of "rap song", she explains. After showing the audience the clapping that goes along with it, she sings "Juba this and Juba that/ Juba kill the yellow cat". During the answer and question time after the show, Wise explained that it was a children's chant and the yellow cat was the slave master.

"Are You Ready My Sister" was brought to the University by The New World Theater, a program of the Fine Arts Center, founded in 1979 in order "to present the theatrical works of people in color as a vibrant and important element of contemporary theater".

Underground Railway Theater has been performing "Are You Ready My Sister" for three years and over a hundred times for audiences across the country. With all the "ooh"s and "ahh"s I heard mixed with "Wow!", I'm sure that the performances will continue. "Are You Ready My Sister" embodies URT's goal: to "challenge and delight, inform and celebrate."

Johnson has new message for feminists

By Trystan Skeigh
Collegian Staff

Sonia Johnson
Amherst College
Feb. 29

Her message: "Sex and Relationships are patriarchy."

Her advice: "Set your body free — you can't do this in a relationship."

Sonia Johnson, radical feminist scholar, activist and mystic, presented excerpts from her new book, The Ship that Sailed into the Living Room — Sex and Intimacy Reconsidered, a deeply critical feminist analysis of lesbian relationships last Friday night to a hundred listeners in Amherst College's Johnson Chapel. Jean Tait, a survivor of bulimia and anorexia, joined Johnson on the platform to add her voice to Johnson's in a powerful, 2 1/2- hour case against lesbian sex and relationships.

Johnson's 25 years of radical feminism has garnered her a great deal of national media attention as well as a reputation as a staunch radical feminist whose analyses of the patriarchy border on the metaphysical. Some would consider her a feminist prophet.

In the late 1970s Johnson was excommunicated by the Mormon Church for her radical beliefs. Becoming active in the National Organization for Women, Johnson began to travel and speak out on the Equal Rights Amendment. In 1981, she led a public fast in support of the ERA in the Illinois Statehouse, and in 1984 she ran for president. Around this time, after having left a marriage of 20 years, Johnson publicly came out as a lesbian and began writing and lecturing on radical feminism.

Johnson and Tait began the night with a poetic exchange:. Johnson: "I remember a time when women did what we wanted to do all the time. . ." Tait ended with "I remember a time when women didn't do relationships."

Johnson spent an hour describing her first lesbian relationship and her gradual realization that they were mimicking "the institution of marriage."

"The irony of it all is that we were each other's jailers," Johnson said.

Even a kiss is not what it seems, according to Johnson, who analyzed the implications of a habitual goodnight kiss.

"A kiss in bed wasn't really a kiss at all. What was I really doing? I was saying. . . Our relationship is still okay, I still want you in my life, don't worry I'm not thinking about anyone else," Johnson said.

Because she realized kisses were a symbol of bondage and control, a part of her conditioning from patriarchy, Johnson said she decided not to kiss her partner Susan anymore unless "it was a real kiss." After this, Johnson said she discovered most kisses in relationships are from habit or part of ownership gestures.

"Do you know how many kisses in a relationship are real kisses," Johnson asked. "Very few — maybe none."

Johnson said she eventually realized that every aspect of her relationship was based on patriarchal conditioning.

After a lengthy dissection of her five-year relationship and her realization that "there wasn't a thing in my relationship that was real," the last hour of Johnson's lecture, which included a short presentation by Tait, leapt straight into the realm of the metaphysical.

Johnson argued that women by nature "are not sexual beings."

Bim Skala Bim: the ska king

Miguel DeJesus, Jr.
Collegian Correspondent

Mix together reggae, calypso, soul Latin jazz, pop and rock and what do you get? Ska, a sound mastered by Bim Skala Bim, one of the hottest bands of 1991.

Bim Skala Bim is a seven piece Boston-based band "leaning heavily towards the ragamuffin persuasion, yet claiming that they are really a rock band."

"How's It Goin'?" the band's third and latest release, has charted some impressive numbers on CMJ, the college radio trade publication. In the two months following the album's June release, "How's It Goin?" reached #3 on CMJ's Breakthrough Chart and #6 on CMJ's Adventure Picks Chart.

The album received rave reviews from critics as well, with The Boston Globe describing the sound as "Brawny Trombone... Fluid Organ... Tangy Acoustic Work," and Face Magazine describing the band as "Gritty, Soulful and Silky Smooth All in One Breath."

Even better than listening to Bim Skala Bim is seeing them live, a fact proven by their large and loyal concert following. Their animated live performances have earned them the title "America's favorite ska act," and have gained them international recognition.

Other Beantown favorites appearing at the Hatch include Chucklehead on March 11, O-Positive on March 25, and Barrence Whitfield and the Savages on April 1. Tickets for Bim Skala Bim are $6, all other shows are $5. Tickets for all shows are available at the door.

Michael Loprete from the Richmond Times Dispatch explains the value of a Bim Skala Bim show: "The next time your house burns down or someone runs over your cat, Bim Skala Bim is the prescribed medication for a pick-up."

Bim Skala Bim will appear at the Hatch Bar at UMass on Wednesday, March 4, at 9 p.m. Tickets are $6, and are available at the door.

"Sex and relationships are patriarchy," Johnson said, "where there is sex there can never be intimacy."

Johnson, who said she believes that women were the primordial first beings, says women learned sex, with its emphasis on genital contact and orgasm, from men.

Before men came, Johnson said "women were touching and stroking all the time... raising power together."

"And then the men came and watched us and envied — because men came to this world with no real power at all... So they came among us and acted as if they were doing the same thing... and they called it sex," Johnson said.

Women are not sexual in the way they have been conditioned, Johnson said.

In order for women to reclaim their freedom they need to leave behind relationships and sex and relearn "unconditional touching" which Johnson and Tait said was physical contact without expectations, because "whenever there's an expectation, that's sex."

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Sharing confidences will strengthen a union that is important to your happiness. Although a new love interest may not appear perfect for you now, all will work out in the end. Give love a chance to blossom.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You find it easier to reach mutually beneficial agreements now. Business talks should be conducted behind closed doors. Avoid leaving anything to chance where child care arrangements are concerned.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): The emphasis now is on knowing what your property is worth. Selling your home could bring a tidy profit. A late afternoon trip proves fruitful. Keep a date with that special person.

Gymnasts continue to falter, men drop third straight meet

By KIM ADDESA
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team suffered its third consecutive loss on Sunday. They were beaten by league rival Syracuse University by a score of 276.65 to 266.80.

The loss puts the Minutemen in third place in Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics competition with a record of 4-2, 7-3 overall.

Syracuse swept six events Sunday on its way to a 10-point victory.

"They're a great team," said UMass coach Roy Johnson. "But not that great."

Inconsistency continues to plague the gymnasts from UMass. A strong team performance on floor exercise (45.85) was followed by unusually weak team performances on pommel horse (43.00) and high bar (42.85).

"If we hit all of our routines on the same day that they hit all of theirs," explained Johnson, "then maybe [Syracuse] beats us by a point or two."

UMass' Steve Christensen finished third in the All-Around competition, with a score of 54.15. He also finished second on pommel horse with a score of 9.65. Finishing in fourth place behind Christensen in the All-Around was teammate Cal Booker with a score of 53.70. Booker finished second on vault with a score of 9.65.

The Minutemen, whose last home meet was Feb. 8, are looking forward to their appearance tonight against league rival Southern Connecticut in Boyden Gymnasium.

Although he is glad to be back in Amherst, Johnson is concerned that after three difficult meets on the road against top competitors his gymnasts may let up.

"Our guys are tired," Johnson said. "We cannot take Southern Connecticut lightly."

Abi Grossman, head coach of the squad from So. Connecticut, was also coach of the 1984 United States Olympic Team. Although his team has struggled this season, "he will have his work done," explained Johnson.

Action begins at 7 p.m. tonight in Boyden Gymnasium.

Previously, a team needed a 59 percent winning percentage to make the state tournament in a high school sport. This year, all a school needed to do was fill out a few forms.

Like lots of good ideas, the open tournament works well on paper but doesn't quite cut it in practice. The logistics of finishing the regular season in time for the tourney, never mind seeding teams, scheduling sites and the like, proved to be a nightmare. The results on paper were even more startling — the teams who otherwise didn't "belong" using the previous criteria didn't fare well as a whole, save the occasional startling upset.

As for my high school, St. Joseph (Pitsfield) takes on Holyoke Catholic tonight at the Springfield Civic Center. Now don't tell me you don't follow your high school's athletic exploits, in-state residents, because I know you do. At least during tournament time. It's not a serious endeavor, usually, but more of a pride thing.

See you at the Cage Wednesday night.

Is Louis Roe the A-10's top freshman?

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

He is the sixth man on the 25th ranked team in the nation, is one of the top rebounders in the Atlantic 10 Conference and even has his own cheering section.

But is University of Massachusetts freshman forward Louis Roe — who is averaging 7.0 points, 6.2 rebounds and 0.6 blocked shots per game for the A-10 regular season champion Minutemen — the A-10's Freshmaan of the Year?

University of Massachusetts freshman forward Louis Roe snatches a rebound in a game earlier this season. Roe is a top candidate for the Atlantic 10 Freshman of the Year award.

"No question about it," said UMass coach John Calipari, whose team is 24-4 (12-3 in the conference) and headed for its first NCAA tournament appearance since the 1961-62 season.

Teammate Jim McCoy said, "Lou Roe is the best freshman in the league."

However, Roe is averaging only 20.5 minutes per contest for the Minutemen — a factor that may hurt him in the voting as the winner will be announced this weekend in Philadelphia, Pa. at the Conference Championships.

Roe's biggest competition for the award will most likely be Rutgers University's Jamal Philips. The 6-foot-7, 215-pound forward is averaging 10.3 points, 5.8 rebounds and 0.78 blocked shots for the 13-13 Scarlet Knights, 5-10 in the A-10.

Philips' statistics may be better than Roe's, but Philips is averaging 3.9 minutes more than Roe and has started in eight contests.

"If he was playing 30 minutes a game, he'd probably average about 16 points and 10 rebounds," Calipari said of Roe, whose fans sit in 'Lou's Roe' at UMass' Curry Hicks Cage.

"If he played a litt'e more, there's no telling how many points and rebounds he would have," said McCoy, who was the A-10 Freshman of the Year following the 1988-89 season.

Roe said, "A lot of people think if I was on any other team in the Atlantic 10 I would be starting, which I think is true. But, I had to come in and accept my role of 20 minutes a game."

Accepting roles is something Roe wasn't accustomed to before coming to UMass, as he was last year's New Jersey High School Player of the Year while leading Atlantic City High to a 24-2 record by averaging 26.1 points and 15.0 rebounds his senior year.

"Believe me, I wanted to start," said Roe, who was also recruited by Syracuse, Florida, Florida State and Clemson. "But, the 20 minutes I have, I go in and do what I have to do."

"He had to play a role on this team and he accepted it very well," said UMass' leading rebounder Harper Williams, who is one of five returnig starters from last year's 20-13 squad.

"What was great about this year was that his feet weren't put in the fire," said Calipari, a leading candidate for A-10 Coach of the Year. "He didn't have any pressure on him. He didn't have to perform because we had other players.

"He just wants to do what's best for us and isn't worried about himself," Calipari said. "His attitude is 'What do I have to do so that we can win.' He doesn't care about scoring and he doesn't complain about not getting 30 minutes per game."

Roe is among the minority when he says he doesn't deserve the award.

"I'm not worried about winning Freshman of the Year, but I don't think I should get it," said Roe, who was honored with the A-10's Freshman of the Week award for two consecutive weeks in December.

"I'm playing well to be a freshman, but my expectations for myself are pretty high."

Roe believes there are still several areas where he can improve his game.

"I get in the game and sometimes I play kind of timid," said the 6-foot-7, 210-pounder. "I just have to keep up my intensity.

"I can improve on my 15-footer, my inside and outside moves and post play. Although I'm an undersized big man, I can jump fairly well and I try to shoot over the taller guys."

And what about Philips, who scored 18 points and grabbed three rebounds when the Scarlet Knights lost to the Minutemen, 77-66, at the Cage Jan. 30?

"I think he's playing well," Roe said. "I wouldn't take anything away from him. He's pretty strong."

But, who's better, say in a one-on-one?

"I'm always going to come out on top," Roe said.

And if Roe doesn't win the Frehman of the Year award?

"He will be first team All-Conference for the next three years," assured Calipari.

UMass lacrosse ranked 11th; Jean Yawkey remembered

Now that the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team is finally back in the Top 25 (goodbye, UConn!), how about UMass' other nationally ranked athletic team — lacrosse.

Massachusetts is ranked 11th in a pre-season coaches' poll conducted by the U.S. Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association. UMass received 235 votes, which is about 100 less than 10th-ranked Duke.

What's really nice about the poll for UMass lax fans is six of its opponents this season are ranked in the top 20: Syracuse, Loyola (MD), Brown, Rutgers, Hofstra and Yale are all on UMass' schedule. Now that the NCAA places more emphasis on strength of schedule in determining tournament seedings, the Gorillas should benefit from the number of ranked teams they face.

Greg Sukiennik

In other lax news, the Syracuse Daily Orange revealed that the Orangemen were guilty of NCAA violations during the three years they won the NCAA title. The findings were made by Syracuse officials during the school's investigation of violations made by the men's basketball program. Seems the Orangemen carried a few scholarships too many between 1988-90. Imagine that: "extra scholarships." Does anyone at UMass know what that even means?

As you read this sentence, have a moment of silence for Jean Yawkey.

The matriarch of the Red Sox wasn't the sort of hands-on owner the likes of which have been polluting Major League baseball the past 20 or so years. She leaves behind an operation with a $40 million payroll and attendance figures astounding for a team playing in a 35,000 seat park. Without firing 15 managers, building a domed stadium in Framingham or threatening to move the team to St. Petersburg.

With that out of the way, let me make more fun of UConn basketball for a while. "It's the right thing to do."

The Huskies got spanked by Seton Hall over the weekend in a loss that dropped them from the Top 25. "Husky Mania" my thumb, if UConn wants to make the Big Show — never mind a decent seed now — they will have to win at least one game in the Big East tourney. Maybe two.

But wait, I'm not done with the Big East yet. A friend of mine from home who attends one of these 10 holier-than-thou institutions bet me 20 bucks three years ago that UMass would never make the NCAA tournament while I was here.

Unless the selection committee changes its criteria in the next two weeks, Dan from Villanova owes me 20 green ones. By the way, the "Mildcats" will be lucky to make the NIT unless something really dramatic happens in the Big East tourney.

Did you see Chicago rip apart Portland yesterday? I don't think there's any doubt over who will eventually win the NBA finals this year. After all, they held the Blazers, an offensive machine if there ever was one, to 17 points in the second quarter. Rave all you want about Michael Jordan, Scottie Pippen and John Paxson, but defense wins titles and the Bulls can play defense with anyone in the NBA.

The Celtics, meanwhile, are certainly happy to have Larry Bird back. One wonders where they're headed considering they wouldn't have beaten Dallas without him. While the C's aren't out of the Atlantic title picture yet, a 10-20 road record does not bode well. Cedric Maxwell, where are you now?

The MIAA, which runs high school sports in this state, is experimenting with an "open" high school basketball tournament this year, with less than desirable

Democrats split, Bush courts voters

By DAVID ESPO
Associated Press

Paul Tsongas won Maryland's presidential primary Tuesday night and Bill Clinton countered in Georgia as Democratic rivals battled coast-to-coast for front-runner credentials. President Bush swept the GOP contests, but Patrick Buchanan maintained his determined challenge.

Bush was sure to win Colorado and the president said he was "well on our way to the nomination." He said he was "committed to regaining" the support of Republican voters who deserted him for the more conservative Buchanan.

Tsongas said his victory made him the "breakthrough kid," because he was the first Democratic candidate to prevail in a primary outside his region.

Georgia presented Clinton with his first victory of the primary season, but it lacked drama, coming in his southern stronghold.

The first votes from Colorado showed a close, three-way finish among Clinton, Tsongas and Jerry Brown, and the night's results appeared to assure a continuous string of primaries as Democrats pick an opponent for Bush in the fall. Democrats held caucuses in Minnesota, Idaho and Washington state, and there was a primary in Utah.

Clinton's victory was a long time coming for the candidate who loomed large before a series of character controversies stalled his campaign in New Hampshire. He hoped to parlay his win into success next week in several southern states, and wasted no time in attacking Tsongas as an advocate of "a refined version of the 1980s style trickle-down economics."

Bush was gaining 62 percent of the GOP vote in Georgia, to 38 prevent for Buchanan, with 67 percent counted. Buchanan said in advance that a strong showing would be enough to fuel his candidacy throughout the primary season.

In Maryland, with 25 of the pricincts in, Bush was gaining 71 percent to 29 percent for Buchanan.

The president was leading for all 91 delegates in the two states. He reached out to Buchanan's supporters, saying "to

Candidates cite experience in student affairs

Editors Note: This is the first in a two part series profiling the candidates for the upcoming elections for Student Government President, and the Student Trustee. A debate will take place on Thursday at 7 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Jennifer Wood and Kevin Newnan say they can bring a combination of two things to student government at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst: experience and organizational and mobilization skills.

Wood, a junior Japaneese major, and Newnan, a fourth year student political science major, are running for SGA president and Student Trustee respectively.

"What we bring is a combination of experience and organizing and mobilization," said Newnan.

"We are running on experience, it is different, but it is complimentary," said Wood.

Wood has held positions with MASSPIRG and SGA and is a Amherst town meeting member this year. At MASSPIRG she was the Chapter Chair in 1990-1991, and was also on the Board of Directors in 1990-1991. She is currently the Commuter Area Government President, and has been a Student Government senator since 1990.

Newnan currently occupies the position of Student Trustee and is again attempting to win that position. Also, he has been a student senator since 1989, and is also an Amherst town meeting member.

There are three main issues that Newnan and Wood plan to tackle if they are elected.

The first issue that they would like to see resolved is the privatization of UMass. They see Governor William Weld's proposal for UMass to keep 100 percent of its tuition, which has been tagged and labeled as tuition retention, as the driving force behind privatization.

"Tuition retention is the first step towards making UMass a quasi-private institution," said Newnan.

Newnan and Wood plan on fighting tuition retention by using Newnan's experience as the incumbent Student Trustee, and Wood's experience as an organizer. Wood has gained experience as a student organizer by being the organizer on the vote no on question three campaign in 1990.

The second issue that they plan on tackling is curbing the increase in tuition and fees, and provide more financial aid for those who are deserving.

"The University is pricing itself out of its mission," said Wood. "Its' mission is to provide quality, affordable education for students across the state," she said.

The third issue is the fight for overall student rights, which will include strict housing regulations on campus and problems UMass students encounter within the town.

They plan on attacking these issues by again using Newnan's experience, Wood's organizational skills and the fact that they are both Amherst town meeting members.

"Experience is knowing what the issues are and how to handle them," concluded Newnan.

Office for children blasts Weld

Gives state poor grades in five of six categories

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Office for Children's Advisory Council on Tuesday gave state government poor grades in providing for its youngsters.

In its first annual report card, issued by advisory council President George Bachrach, the council rated the performance of Gov. William F. Weld and the Legislature in six areas of services to children in 1991.

Only in health care, where the state got a B minus, did the grades exceed a C.

The other areas were child care, education, support for families, basic human needs and mental health.

Joe Landolfi, a spokesman for the state's Executive Office of Health and Human Services, acknowledged the state's fiscal crisis had required some spending cuts in social programs.

But, Landolfi said, "Despite some cutbacks that we are not denying we had to make, we are providing one of the best child welfare systems in the country."

The report card gave a grade of D in the child care area, saying that 3,600 fewer families received day care subsidies in 1991 than in 1990.

Education got a C grade, primarily because of funding cuts. But Bachrach said that grade could rise for 1992 if a successful school reform package was passed by the Legislature and signed by Weld.

In health, the report card praised health indicators that were above the national average, as well as state support for nutrition programs for pregnant women and young children. But the report criticized the decision to remove 9,000 young people between 18 and 21 from the Medicaid program.

Support for families got a D plus, primarily because of well-publicized problems in the Department of Social Services and the backlog of children awaiting adoption.

The grade in basic human needs was a D minus, primarily because of cuts in public assistance programs for poor children and families, such as the elimination of clothing allowance and cuts in General Relief for families.

Children's mental health services got a C minus because of the lack of community-based programs.

Strong Black support helped give the victory to Clinton in Georgia, where the economy remained a potent issue in producing a sizable anti-Bush vote for Buchanan, according to exit polls.

In Maryland, Tsongas had 40 percent to 33 percent for Clinton. Brown had nine percent.

Clinton was leading for 87 delegates from the two states; Tsongas for 50.

Lent brings campus time of reflection

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

Yes — the season has arrived. Another season of sacrifice, a spiritual awakening, the wake up call for the beloved Easter bunny.

Tomorrow is Ash Wednesday, and begins for most Christians the first day of Lent.

"It is not a holy day, but it is a nice way to start the Lenten season," said Father Joseph Quigley, director of the Newman Center.

"Lent is a time to give people the chance to get insight into the meaning of life as a Christian sees it," he said. "It is the discovery of being a Christian," Quigley said.

Lent is a time for many Christians to give up materialistic objects so that they may pay homage to Jesus Christ. Christians believe that Jesus gave his life on the cross for mankind.

"People make resolutions during lent which have negative connotations, that is they give up food or a social activity," said Quigley.

"It should be more positive, and you should check out how you are doing yourself," he said.

"It makes me think of a time when your supposed to sacrifice something of yourself," said Matt McGuinness, a senior political science major.

Contrary to popular belief, Lent is not just a Catholic holiday. "You don't have to be Catholic to celebrate Lent," said Jennifer Blunt, a junior political science major.

"I am going to try and give up chocolate for Lent," she said.

But not all people remembered that it was the season of Lent. "I forgot about Lent until my friend reminded me of it," said Kim Caisse, a senior finance major.

"I am not going to give up anything, but I am going to try and go to church more often as well as be nicer to my roommate," Caisse concluded.

Some students have taken advantage of the Lenten season to try and kick some bad habits.

"I am going to try and give up the cancer sticks," said Aiden Malloy, a junior political science major.

But on a more academic note others are using this time to try and build a concrete foundation for their education and enhance their study skills.

"I want to study more on the weeknights instead of going out all the time," said Kerrin McDonald, a senior sociology major.

But then again, on this campus where dissenting opinions are in abundance, some have taken an anti-academic approach.

Man Kwan Soon prays in the Newman Center. Today is Ash Wednesday, the beginning of the Lenten season.

"I am giving up a class for Lent because I have too many credits," said Kerri Stockwell, a senior English major.

You might be wondering what the almighty man on campus himself is giving up as a sacrifice.

"I am going to try and give up the late night movie, because I am a sucker for those," said Father Quigley.

"I will have to start reading or practicing yoga in the corner before I go to bed every night," he concluded.

Masses will be offfered at Newman center today.

UMass climatologist downplays ozone loss

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts climatologist is downplaying alarm over recent scientific studies which point to the accelerated deterioration of the earth's protective ozone layer.

Raymond Bradley, a professor of geology and geography who has done atmospheric research in the Arctic, said there is not enough solid evidence to suggest an ozone hole could open up over New England.

"I don't think there's any evidence of that," Bradley said. "We don't know what the natural background levels of ozone are."

Bradley said records of ozone levels and atmospheric temperatures only go back for a few decades. "So we really don't know how things change over time due to natural fluctuations."

Forecasts of ozone depletion may not be due to emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases, Bradley said.

Nevertheless, Bradley said, "The observations would point to a drop in ozone at at a faster level then anticipated."

He said last year's eruption of Mount Pinatubo — one of the largest volcanic eruptions this century — may be the culprit of recent reports of increases in ozone-depleting chemicals in the atmosphere.

"It's a leap of faith to say that more people will get skin cancer because of higher concentrations of ozone-depleting chemicals in the atmosphere," Bradley said.

"Right now, we simply don't know how much ozone will be depleted."

Although he's not sounding an alarm, Bradley said governments must begin to eliminate chlorofluorocarbons (CFC's) which destroy the ozone that protects the earth from harmful rays from the sun.

On Febuary 11, President Bush announced that "the United States will unilaterally accelerate the phaseout of substances that deplete the earth's ozone layer and called on other nations to agree to an accelerated phaseout schedule."

Bradley also downplayed the results of a recent survey of climate scientists which said about 50 percent of them believe global warming may reach a point of no return leading to "complete ecological collapse."

"The results reveals an as-yet poorly expressed fear among a growing number of climate scientists," said Jeremy Leggett, a Greenpeace International director in an interview with the Boston Globe.

"If these climate models prove — like all the forecasts of ozone depletion — to be significant underestimates, we are in potentially terminal trouble," he said.

While Bradley calls ozone depletion and global warming an "alarming experiment," surveys like this call for precaution but not panic.

"I don't know of any [scientists] that say there's a runaway greenhouse effect," he said. "It's a lack of information that's holding back a definitive answer."

Author speaks to class

Bloom emphasizes passion in writing

By DOUGLAS BANKS
Collegian Correspondent

Lary Bloom does more than just talk about writing. He does more than write books about writing. Bloom, the editor and founder of Northeast magazine, the Sunday magazine of the Hartford Courant, is even more than a writer — he is also a speaker.

On Monday, students of Prof. Madeleine Blais, of the journalism department, listened to Bloom's anecdeotal advice while he paced the room, offering his experience and hoping that, at the least, "15 percent [of what he said] would be worth remembering."

Bloom, author of The Writer Within, gives hope to unpublished authors everywhere: "When I was in your seats, I aspired to a C- in life. I had no sense of being a writer, I only had an instinct. Now, you may not believe this, but I believe everything written well gets published. However, it's got to find a market. Never stop looking."

He says in his book, "All writers are insecure by nature." He reiterated that theme during his talk when he empathized with the novice writer, asking "Why would editors be interested in me?" His answer to that very legitimate question is an honest one.

"Remember that editors, despite what you might think, are people, with interests, prejudices, and passions." He says magazine and news editors need people.

What are important to Bloom, as an editor, are the passion and skill with which the piece is written, not a writer's background or experience. "I never reject an article on the basis of the writer's resume," he said.

To verify this, his book mentions the story of Homeless Joe, a man who walked from Hartford to Washington, D.C. on foot, without any provisions, keeping a diary of his experiences. Although Homeless Joe's story was practically illegible, Bloom recognized its significance.

"Although we edited it, we decided to publish it without changing the grammar. It was honest, and Joe had a great sense of storytelling and drama. A person like Joe has things to say, and you can't ignore a person's story just because. . .they don't dot all their i's," he said. Homeless Joe's manuscript was turned in on a spiral notebook.

Bloom said he likes pieces as rare as Homeless Joe's because in the 10 years he's been editor of Northeast, he and his co-editors have avoided sweeping surveys and generalizations in their stories, preferring the "power of the particular."

He says writers should strive to find the one specific example that adequately represents the whole.

"I try to publish what's in the heart of the community," says Bloom, who also writes a biweekly column in addition to his many other chores. "I would rather publish interpretive, intimate point-of-view pieces. There is strength in the narrative style." This attitude, however, got him fired for an hour in 1987, when he and his boss disagreed on a story that Bloom published.

Bloom spoke of Faulkner's answer to the question "what drives you to write?" Faulkner answered in one word, "outrage." Bloom said if he were to answer in one word, he would chose "illumination, I think." Which is why it is easy to believe him when he proclaims, "don't follow a particular camp or point of view because you feel obligated, find your own voice and follow it." This advice lies at the heart of The Writer Within.

Chancellor O'Brien visits with TAP students

By EVELYN A. DE JESUS
Collegian Staff

Chancellor Richard O'Brien visited the School of Management Talented Advanced Program macroeconomics class yesterday to share the views of students on the program.

Stared last fall, the Talented Advanced Placement Program (TAP) is a residential program of the School of Management. This program is made with the purpose of having the same group of freshman students, living in the same dorm, take the same economics, college writing and Calculus classes and discussions together. In that way they can get more personal attention, study together, and have an environment of motivation.

"It is a way the University can provide a small college environment, small classes, and a bigger range of courses available in a large campus with the large university setting," said Norman Aitken, vice chancellor for academic affairs, provost and director of the program.

Students expressed their opinions of the program with the Chancellor and Aitken, from their reasons for enrolling the program and their results on it, to the D.C. food.

"The program was a big decision of what made me to come to UMass," said Brett L'Esperance, a TAP student. "It was the main reason because I heard many rumors about the lack of attention you recieved there. I read about the program and when I got accepted that made my mind to go to UMass. So far the choice I made had worked really well for me."

"It's diverse, I think it's very interesting," said Camille Sautner, another TAP student.

"They seem afraid to season the food here," said Natasha Deed, a student on the program.

"The biggest thing it has is motivation," said Sander Casino, a TAP student.

"People are closer," one of the students said.

"I had trouble with math, in the discussions it was good we went over homework," said Chris Conlon, one of the students.

Dan Jacobs was happiest with the "availability of the people in the same program to help me. I don't have to be searching for people all around campus. Everyone is a person, not a number," he said.

Aitken says he is very satisfied with the results of the program and says he wants to continue it for the next year for this and the next incoming freshman class. He also says there are more residential programs on campus such as the Foreign Language Suites in Sylvan, the

UVC finally acquires cable station

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Hold on to your remote control. After waiting for 15 years, the Union Video Center, a Registered Student Organization, has their own cable channel which features programs engineered by the students for the students, said UVC's Cable Coordinator.

"The UVC is ecstatic about getting the new channel. We are jumping for joy," said Joanna Heron, the cable coordinator.

The UVC, which was founded in the mid 1970s, started out with one old camera and today owns many cameras along with editing equipment and an engineering room, said Heron.

David Scillicorn, one of the founding fathers of UVC, said during a speech given before UVC's premiere show he was very happy with UVC's progress. "In the end I knew [the UVC] would do great things," said Scillicorn.

The UVC, which has about 200 members, received their channel after many meetings and discussions with Housing Services, said Heron. "The students deserve to have their own cable channel," she said.

UVC's programs, which will be aired weekdays on channel 19 from 2:30 p.m. until 8 p.m., will feature shows ranging from student plays, avant-garde films, documentaries and University of Massachusetts basketball game reruns, Heron said.

"UVC wants to reach a variety of people with programs that interest everyone. We are a multi-faceted organization," said Heron.

Alec Jarnagin, president of UVC, said the new channel will enable UVC to reach the community and to service more students. "Members of UVC will get their ideas across faster and students will actually see how UVC works."

"I expect UVC to grow rapidly and to have many more members because we will be reaching more students," Heron said. "Before, [without the channel], it was like running a radio station without a transmitter."

He said along with UVC's channel comes the responsibility of maintaining a higher quality of programing and raising money for more equipment.

The UVC earns money by holding workshops to show students how to run the equipment, said Heron. The students must attend these workshops, which cost $60, to become a UVC member, she said.

Honors Program in Orchard Hill and in John F. Kennedy tower in Southwest.

"They [students] seem very happy, able to combine academic and social life together and satisfied with the University," said Aitken.

Chancellor O'Brien expressed that this type of program is a way to make the University a more "interesting" place to study.

■ Bloom

He says, "We find ourselves saying to the writers: Be natural; clear. We quoted great writers, those who don't waste words. Two things that help a writer are research and reading in general, especially great fiction because it makes you want to be a great writer."

Also, according to Bloom, just because a story is long, every word should have a meaning to the piece. "Say what you want to say, throw everything else out," he said.

Although Bloom ultimately admits that storytelling is heading the way of the Dodo bird and more people read People magazine than the Saturday Evening Post, "more people remember a nonfiction narrative story."

Also, he says, the first publishing you should do is for yourself. "The expression is in the writing, which is a normal human instinct, like talking. It's the communication; it's in the doing. I don't think it's what comes after [publication]. It's the actual birth of the thing."

Facts can't be denied

This is the column concerning New Testament reliability that was promised you last week. First the bibliographical test, which concerns the reliability of existing manuscripts (MSS) and the time period between the original and existing copies.

There are two important facts in favor of New Testament reliability. Over 24,000 copies of the New Testament or portions of it are in existence. The Iliad by Homer is the only other ancient book that comes close to this number with 643 existing copies.

Diana D'Avanzo

Frederic G. Kenyon, expert in issuing MSS statements has said, "In no other case is the interval of extant manuscripts so short as in that of the New Testament," noting that the earliest books were written around 60 years after Jesus' ministry and the oldest books were written somewhere between 250 to 300 years later.

Kenyon goes on to say "...this may sound a considerable interval, but it is nothing to that which parts most of the great classical authors from their earliest manuscripts. We believe we have in all essentials an accurate text of the seven extant plays of Sophocles; yet the earliest substantial manuscript upon which it is based was written more than 1,400 years after the poet's death."

The internal evidence test concerns determining the extent of credibility of the original work. Recall Dr. Louis Gottschalk's statement: "The ability of the writer or witness to tell the truth is helpful to the historian to determine credibility" and this ability "is closely related to the witness's nearness both geographically and chronologically to the events recorded."

New Testament accounts of the life of Jesus were written by eyewitnesses or men who were relating eyewitness accounts. Matthew, Mark, John and Peter all claimed to be eyewitnesses. Luke states that he is compiling eyewitness accounts. Read any of the New Testament books written by these authors for evidence.

Also, because these men turn to common knowledge concerning Jesus, the New Testament is considered all the more reliable. An example of such a reference is taken from Paul's defense of his faith to Festus, "...For the king knows these matters...I am persuaded that none of these things escape his notice; for this has not been done in a corner"(Acts 26:26) Note that Paul was referring to Jesus' life and teachings.

The external evidence test deals with outside sources agreeing with the information contained in the document in question. Gottschalk has said "conformity or agreement with other known historical or scientific facts is often the decisive test of evidence, whether of one or more witnesses."

Concerning external evidence and New Testament reliability, the accuracy of the apostle John's writings were confirmed by two figures; Papias, bishop of Hierapolis(A.D. 130) and Iraneus, bishop of Lyons(A.D. 180). In relation to Archaeology, Archaeologist Joseph Free stated: "Archaeology has confirmed countless passages which have been rejected by critics as unhistorical or contradictory to known facts."

Of the New Testament book of Acts, classical historian A.N. Sherwin White says "for Acts the confirmation of historicity is overwhelming" and "any attempt to reject its basic historicity even in matters of detail must now appear absurd."

There you have it folks. A very, very few facts that uphold the Bible's reliability.

Talk to you after Break and remember: Jesus loves you more than you know. (So cheer up!)

Chain smoker has an offer

One of my favorite pastimes is to gather with two or three of my more deranged looking friends and harass the campus tours. Even when I'm alone, walking on campus, my eyes water with perverse joy when I see a tour group approaching. There is the tour guide, trying to put a brave face on UMass. There are the parents, alternately giddy with pride and talking too much, or unimpressed with the thought of their firstborn attending this university and so morosely silent. When I'm alone, I usually just point out some nearby, obvious defect in the infrastructure: If we're near the library, I'll call out, "Hey hey hey, there, tell them why there's a big fence around the library!" However, when with comrades, our tactic varies. We assume blank, zombie-like stares, we march directly at the hapless tour and we chant "We're gonna get your daughters, we're gonna get your daughters . . ."

Chris J. Petropoulos

I had the pleasure of waylaying such a group this past week and it got me to thinking about what I, a self-proclaimed cynic and purveyor of the weird, would show these young skulls full of mush in a brisk walk around the place. I would stand right next to where the real tours start with a sign that reads "Better Tours." Gathering my flock and lighting a cigarette, we would begin.

The Campus Center: "Lots of stuff happens here. You can get money downstairs and snack upstairs. It's a good place to sit and smoke and watch the chattel come and go."

The Student Union: The last time I actually went on a tour, this area was skipped, mainly, I think, because of all the radical, political propaganda that adorns it. Some parents, on seeing this, might decide right then and there that no child of theirs was coming to this university. Anyway, here I would inform them: "This is the Student Union, a silly place with lots of silly groups and a post office and the SAO office, the most insidious place on campus, where professional "managers" waste your money if you actually decide to come here. The less time spent here, the better. You can get Snapple beverages in the mini-store, however."

The Duck Pond: "This is the duck pond. After a few semesters, you will know it well. You will come here in the dead of morning, drunk and chain smoking. You will look at the water and wonder why you came here, why you aren't learning anything, and if there is any escape."

The Fine Arts Center: "The FAC, as we like to call it, is one of the few bright spots on this otherwise ashen landscape. You can see plays here and other good stuff. The only problem is that the structure itself is like something out of The Dream Quest of Unknown Kaddath, and it can drive one crazy. You'll come here at night to climb on its boggling angles, and you'll see . . ."

Whitmore: My tour would approach this place very carefully. We would view it from a distance, behind some bushes or trees. "You will find only evil here. It is Whitmore. Powerful beings work and perhaps live there. You will have to enter it sometime, but always tell someone before you go so that if you don't come back, they can organize a search party."

The Dairy Mart at Triangle Street: I would take them here to show them how far they would have to talk to get something late at night, or cigarettes anytime.

E Lot near (!) Orchard Hill: On the way to E Lot, I would point out the various dorms and when we achieved E Lot, I would say, "This is where you will have to park your car. Think of how far it is from the dorms. This is one of the closest E Lots to any dorm group. Wouldn't you be pissed if someone made you walk out here for no good reason? Let's go back now."

The Campus Center: Like most things at this university, my tour would end where it began, leading people in a circle. Here I would mention the things I had to skip: Liquors 44, the underground tunnels, Wildwood, and the gaping, salivating maw of Morrill. Then I would light a cigarette and walk away chanting "we're gonna get your daughters . . .we're gonna get your daughters . . ."

Apathy is a disease

I submit here and now that you are apathetic.

You are so apathetic, in fact, that if you don't know what "apathetic" means you are not going to look it up in the dictionary. That's not your style. It's too much hassle. But relax! (After all, that's what you do best.) It's not your fault. Actually, I should say not our fault, for I am apathetic too.

We are the generation of decline, the children of low progress. Just another sorry example of deteriorating American quality. We are the products of industry that has provided us with everything, leaving us nothing to work for.

Brooke C. Wheeler

Everyone gets into college nowadays. Being accepted to college is no longer a mark of years of sweat and hard work in high school, saving money from multiple jobs for tuition, being the first in your family to go. Forget hard work—nowadays if you can spell your name correctly, you're in!

And what do we do once we get in? (You need to ask?) PAAAARTY! PARTY! DUDE, YEAH!! "College tuition is the world's largest cover charge." Get in, get drunk, get out, get a . . . job? Naaah, we can make our college "education" last a few more years.

Now, at this point you are becoming indignant, thinking that I'm just a generalizing fool, saying to yourself "excuse me, I work hard, I appreciate my opportunities, don't tell me I'm apathetic!" Well, I think I can safely say you're either deluded or part of an exclusive minority from the other side of the spectrum: the overachievers. But let's save that for another column.

Yes, I'm sorry, it's true. Every single one of you can fit in somewhere on the scale of apathy. Maybe you have skipped class to sleep in one morning. Or maybe every morning? I know people to whom going to class at all is a rather novel idea.

If you do go to class, do you actually stay awake? Take notes? Are you genuinely interested in the subject matter, or is it just another lousy requirement, a waste of your time, a pain in your butt? You could be back in bed asleep, or hangin' in the Bluewall, or watching soaps, or doing laundry, or throwing back a few beers. (Never mind that classes cost your parents about thirty bucks each.) Why do you bother going to class at all? WHAT THE HELL ARE YOU HERE FOR?

Tell me, honestly, do you ever do your "best" in any class? Do you really ever do any more than the minimum to get by? Yeah, I know — you busted your butt until 4:00 in the morning last semester writing that ten-page paper. Or you crammed for two sleepless days and nights for that exam . . . making up for how many days of homework and studying you never did during the semester?

What's your major? a) Don't know yet. b) Don't care. c) Uh, I'm in between majors at the moment. d) What's one you have to do the least amount of work for? e) Do I have to major in something?

I would like to interrupt my accusatory speech at this point to confess, to admit that I do not disclude myself from the masses of apathy. When I talk in such an accusing manner, I am also addressing myself. I have missed classes, blown off work to do something stupid, crammed for finals to make up for a semester's worth of disinterest, and not so infrequently. But if I thought it were just me, I would not be so concerned.

Student apathy is a contagious disease of epidemic proportions.

I know there are many of you who do put forth effort, but how much of it is half-hearted? Am I being too wistful for a time when American pride was in everything, people worked hard to better themselves, and our math scores were not the lowest of any nation? Please convince me those days are not gone forever.

Yo What's Up! March is Women's Month

By SONDRA SUTTON
Collegian Staff

Black History month maybe over, however, there will still be many more events and functions sponsored throughout the semester by and for the hard working students of color here at the University of Massachusetts. Let's show our brothers and sisters that we support them, as well as their efforts for making UMass a more comfortable, and "Colorful" place to be.

If there are announcements for up and coming events which pertain to the ALANA community, they may be brought to the Collegian, and left in the Black Affairs box.

Keep in mind that the Black Affairs Page appears in the Collegian every two weeks, so plan accordingly.

March, in case anyone forgot, is National Women's Month. We all know that there are many wonderful women in the African American community. So brothers give your sisters a pat on the back, a hug or say "Sister I appreciate you, and all that you do to make this world brighter."

Mount Holyoke College is having their "Second Annual Majority Women's Conference and Celebration of Women of Color: Building Global Coalitions between Women of Color." Here is a listing of some of the events which will occur during their conference.

Thurs, March 5: Panel; The role of U.S. and international women in the "New World Order." Panelists are Five College faculty women of color. It will take place in the Hooker Auditorium at 4:30.

Fri, March 6: Health issues affecting U.S. and international women of color. Topics include, AIDS, breast cancer, malnutrition and reproductive health. Betty Shabazz house, 6 p.m.

Workshop; White women against racism: building coalitions with women of color. Blanchard Intercultural Lounge 4-6 p.m.

Workshop; Confronting homophobia in our communities. A discussion of issues of heterosexism and homophobia as they affect women of color. Blanchard Intercultural Lounge 10:30- noon.

Workshop; The privilege of education: bridging the gap between women of color in the community and educated women of color. Blanchard Intercultural Lounge 2-4 p.m.

Sun, March 8: Workshop; multi-racialism and mulit-ethnicity: acknowledging the realities of women of mixed heritage and mixed cultures in our community. Blanchard Intercultural Lounge 10:30- noon.

Also on Sunday March 8, the Sylvan Cultural Center presents "An Evening of Jazz" featuring the world-reknowned "Saud" jazz ensemble of New York featuring Galen Abdur-razzaq. This event will take place at the University of Massachusetts in the Campus Center 10th floor starting at 8:00 p.m. 8-9 social hour, 9-10 Dinner Buffet. Jazz concert starts at 9:30, 11:30 p.m. - 2:00 p.m. after party, music by B.M.C.P.

Students of color meet with UMass police

By SONDRA SUTTON
Collegian Staff

Black History Month here at the University of Massachusetts was very successful. I give two thumbs up to all who were apart of it. Academic Support Services did an excellent job by sponsoring a discussion with the UMass police department. The event took place on February 19, in the Malcolm X center.

The discussion began with a brief introduction of the officers in attendance, and the faculty members present. Students proceeded to ask questions, most concerning the tensions between African- American students and the police officers here at the University. Many students stressed a concern with the definition of "probable cause."

They felt that the term was too general, and that it is often misused. Chief of Police Jack Lupo explained that an officer should have a valid reason if he, for example, pulled a student over in a car. The student has a right to know why he is being stopped.

Other questions which were brought up at the discussion were in reference to the double security at late night events sponsored by Black organizations on campus.

Delphine Quralles, from the Students Activities Office, has worked with many organizations surrounding late night events. She said it was the students who had decided that they wanted extra security measures taken at their events, and that metal detectors are not mandatory. "The students sponsoring the event had friends and family who would be there, they wanted everyone to be safe."

The general feeling was that the discussion would have been much more productive, had the officers that students have conflicts with were there. Chief Lupo said that he did mention the discussion to his officers and he urged them to come.

UMass student Dwight Robinson said that he felt uncomfortable with the fact that the chief had urged the other officers to attend, and that they were not there.

Despite the absence of the other officers, those officers who did attend, Barbara O'Connor, Jack O'Connor, Steve Warren, Dave Hastings, Jose Roberio, Brian Davies, and Chip Thrasher, did a good job in answering some of the questions asked.

Officer Barbara O'Connor said that she really wants the relationship between students of color and the officers to improve. "I think this discussion idea is excellent, at least we are talking."

Project Pulse

Student Affairs University of Massachusetts at Amherst

On Wednesday, October 30, 1991, Project PULSE conducted a telephone survey for the Information Data Bank (IDB), operated by the Dean of Students Office. The survey examined levels of student awareness and use of the IDB. PULSE interviewers attempted to contact 840 students selected randomly from the undergraduate student population, and 430 agreed to be interviewed. The response rate for the survey was 51%.

All of the students sampled, regardless of whether they had heard of or used the IDB, were asked which resource they use most to obtain academic information.

Next, students were asked which resource they use most to obtain non-academic information, such as information about clubs, sporting events, UVC, arts events, etc. (see Figure 2).

Finally, students were asked how the IDB could be effectively advertised (see Figure 3).

More than half (51.1%, n=217) of the students said through the Collegian.

Japanese Kodo thundered the FAC with drums

By CHRIS SHADOIAN
Collegian Staff

Kodo
One Earth Tour
Fine Arts Center
February 27, 1992

If you missed Kodo, you made a big mistake.

The world-reknown company of Japanese drummers played to an appreciative full house at the Fine Arts Center last Friday, and MAN, were they terrific!

Performing mainly on the taiko, the traditional Japanese drum, the 11 member troupe played for a full two hours with no intermissions except to move instruments on and off stage between songs.

In ancient Japan, the taiko was used as a symbol for each village, and the village limits were determined solely by the farthest distance from which the drum could be heard. If the drum couldn't be heard, the village boundaries had been passed.

The first song, "Shishi-Ku," was a device to lead the audience into the performance. It started off soft, with three drummers beating out some basic rhythms. But the song slowly built in intensity, and filled the entire concert hall.

The entire performance, for a show with no electronic equipment, was loud. And I mean loud. My ears were ringing slightly when I walked out at the end of the night.

But some of the songs were amazingly complex and beautiful, and required incredible endurance from the performers.

"Chonlima," for example, lasted for about 15 minutes, and the players were constantly playing at frantic speeds while they were dancing around the stage. I never thought anyone could get such a workout from playing the drums.

Probably the finest single aspect of the show was the synchronicity of the sounds. All the individual drummers played in absolute harmony. Sometimes there would be four drummers on stage playing the exact same rhythm and, if I closed my eyes, they all sounded like one loud drum.

The peak of the concert was "O-Daiko," a song which began with a single, monotonous, booming beat. The beat, which is supposedly what a mother's heartbeat sounds like to a child in the womb, stopped and a curtain was raised revealing the source of the sound: an immense drum standing on a huge cart.

This miyadaiko drum was carved from a single tree, measured five feet across, and weighed over 800 pounds, hence the cart. Four people were required to move it to it's eventual center stage position.

Two people played the drum, one of them, on one side, played a basic rhythm, and the other improvised on the opposite side. The deep bass rhythms filled the auditorium with no difficulty.

Kodo began in 1971, on the island of Sado in the Sea of Japan, but did not adopt their now famous name until 1981, when they began touring in other countries, beginning at the Berlin Festival.

Since that time, Kodo has had consistently sold out performances all across five different continents.

There is no way I can truthfully describe the beauty and excellence of Kodo. And if I haven't said enough to convince you yet, you will simply have to see them for yourself.

They'll be playing in Los Angeles, Berkeley, East Lansing, Ann Arbor and Toronto later on this spring, and are celebrating their tenth year of touring in North America this year.

If you are anywhere near any of those places, go see them. You won't regret it. I promise.

See our tiny planet through the eyes of aliens

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

Tales of the Lost Formicans
Rand Theater, UMass
Feb. 27-29 and March 4-7, 1992

Tales of the Lost Formicans is an enormous play, with enormous insight.

Like many of the works by dramatist Constance Congdon, the scope of the show is vast — encompassing, in this case, everything from a small, dysfunctional family to the outer limits of space.

Much of the show is an examination of the relative size of things — it opens with a trio of aliens poring over a massive astral map, trying to locate the tiny mark which represents our world, Earth. This is the first of many devices used to show mankind reduced in stature, and these devices continue to strike closer to home as the play continues.

We see our planet as a mere speck in the cosmos, a runaway teen a mere speck in our country, and a lost car a mere speck in a cornfield. The play's characters are constantly dwarfed by ever smaller surroundings, until, ultimately, we are met with the image of a man as a frail, living skeleton, vanishing into the folds of his hospital gown.

This depiction of our insignificance may seem bleak, yet it does not serve to frighten. Rather, it fills one with an awe and amazement not unlike that expressed by the ever-present aliens, to whom our culture is a "complex...intangible...wonder."

Constance Congdon has written a play for, and about, the real people of a modern-day "Formican" society. She examines a culture of Levittown-style pre-fab houses, and massive plastic malls. She relates our problems, whether as transitory as teen angst, or as shattering as Alzheimer's disease.

And though our society is placed in frightening perspective, it is never really belittled. Watching Formicans, we are able to find endless delight in the endless ordinary.

The current Rand Theater production is a perfect live expression of this play. The scenic design, by Terry Beckett, gives us a tasteless modern home of of linoleum and chrome, fringed by massive stone-like slabs which stand as part Stonehenge and part mall art.

This space is ingeniously utilized by director Richard Trousdell, who manages to guide the show fluidly from comedy to drama, to surrealism and back again, without ever disturbing the delicate balance of the text. A more sensitive transcription is hard to imagine.

The show is further buoyed by an almost unexceptionally wonderful cast of student actors.

Michael Tritto and Sara Whitcomb shine in their roles as an elderly couple coping with Alzheimer's disease. Brian Smith is unnervingly perfect as a paranoic nurse and conspiracy buff, and Ian Wedegartener plays a great brooding teen, with an affinity for vulgarity. Even supporting player Robert Corddry, who handles numerous small roles, exhibits an exceptional range — he doesn't miss a beat in going from a honey-voiced Alien to an abusive truck driver.

But the evening's biggest ovation must go to actress Joan Jubett, whose role as a divorced mother — saddled with every type of personal and financial problem — is the most demanding in the show.

It is a testament to Miss Jubett's immense skill that she appears to play the part with such ease. This is a bolder, more finely wrought performance than anyone could hope to expect outside of strictly professional theater.

Student acting does not, and can not, get any better than this, just as student theatre can not get better than the Rand's production of Tales of the Lost Formicans. See it while you can.

Connecting with campus cable

By JAMIE GORNSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Hello, and welcome to this week's edition of the Campus Cable Connection. This week, one of my favorite "kick back and relax" summer flicks, Summer School will be on as well as a plethora of greats and flops. And away we go with the movies that will be on beginning Wednesday, March 4.

And Justice for All — Al Pacino, Jack Warden, John Forsythe. Pacino is a lawyer who battles the judicial system of Maryland. The satire is hysterical and mixes well with some touchingly sad moments about the lies and truths of justice. ***

The Big Chill — Tom Berenger, Glenn Close, Jeff Goldblum, William Hurt. Chock full of stars, this movie bases itself on a group of old college friends (ex-radicals) who have become more in tune with society. Superb acting, brilliantly directed by Lawrence Kasdan. The only flaw is a somewhat weak script, but overall a good film.

Blind Date — Kim Basinger, Bruce Willis, John Larroquette. This movie is an annoyingly typical farce by director Blake Edwards (A Fine Mess) about a mega-yuppie (Willis) who takes a beautiful blonde (who else? Basinger) on a blind date. He is warned not to give her alcohol, but if he didn't then there would be no script, however lame it might be. Larroquette is amusing as the jealous fiance of Basinger.*

Butch Cassidy and the Sundance Kid — Paul Newman, Robert Redford, Katharine Ross. Boy oh boy, in 1969 Newman and Redford were ever in their prime acting and (cough) otherwise. These two guys are outlaws being pursued by the sheriff and his posse. Some fantastic scenes, and the cinematography, which won Conrad Hall an Oscar, is breathtaking. The original score and the screenplay also took away Oscars. A cinematic triumph!*

Compromising Positions — Susan Sarandon, Raul Julia, Edward Herrmann. This black comedy is about a beautiful housewife (Sarandon) who is intrigued by the murder of a local dentist. Some scenes were funny and necessary, others just missed the mark completely. Sarandon, as always, sparkles.  1/2

Escape from New York — Kurt Russell, Lee Van Cleef, Ernest Borgnine. Apparently this director has a thing about the future being very bleak and austere. It leaves you with a bad taste in your mouth. The year is 1997, and Snake Plissken (Russell) tries to escape from Manhattan, which has been turned into a maximum security prison. Believe me, it sounds better than it actually is. **

Firebirds — Nicolas Calge, Tommy Lee Jones, Sean Young. Oh Look! Someone tried to be original and went and made a movie about drug cartels and helicopters and stuff! Boy, I don't know about you, but I'd reach into my wallet and shell out money for this one. NOT. This film is blah, the acting is beyond heinous, and I have determined through much research that Sean Young gets her acting motivation from a head of lettuce. NO STARS.

Hamburger Hill — Anthony Barrile, Michael Patrick Boatman, Don Cheadle. I suppose I'm biased after seeing Platoon, but the film just wasn't emotionally charged. The scenes are realistic and some are brutal, but other Vietnam films have done much better. **

Little Murders — Elliott Gould, Marcia Rodd, Vincent Gardenia. Wonderful 70s black comedy about life (sometimes good, sometimes horrible) in New York City. Sometimes a little bit too depressing in parts. Overall a good film, and splendid acting. 1/2

The Long, Hot Summer — Paul Newman, Joanne Woodward, Orson Welles, Anthony Franciosa. Made in 1958, this is the Newmans' first film together. Based on a blend of William Faulkner short stories, the film is a delightful drama that was later remade into a TV movie. ***

The Hot Rock — Robert Redford, George Segal, Ron Leibman. Boy, Newman and Redford are getting lots of coverage this week, huh? Amusing comedy about a couple of bumbling thieves who manage to do everything wrong during a heist. 1/2

Real Genius — Val Kilmer, Gabe Jarret, Michelle Meyrink. Stylish satire about a bunch of whiz kids who are being exploited by a very slimy William Atherton. The premise is kind of blah, but the acting, especially by Kilmer, is light and funny. I guarantee at least a few good laughs. ***

Revenge of the Nerds, II: Nerds in Paradise — Robert Carraine, Curtis Armstrong, Larry B. Scott. Yes, the first one was cute, but this one made me want to vomit profusely. The Lambda Lambda Lambda nerds go to Ft. Lauderdale for a fraternity conference; predictable and generally stupid. The people who made this film seem to know very little about Greek life today. NO STARS.

Ruthless People — Danny DeVito, Bette Midler, Judge Reinhold. Ah, another fun film from the Zucker brothers. In order to run away with his lover sleazy DeVito plans to murder his wife (Mideler), who is planning to get rid of DeVito and run away with HER lover. But the plan is thrown off when Midler is kidnapped and held for ransom. A tad bit too vicious, but DeVito is perfect. ***

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A good day to rally support for a pet project. Although family duties could push certain social plans into the background during morning hours, you should be free to have fun later on.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): The romantic outlook is favorable. A social occasion will be fun if you deep you emotions and temper in check. A family member's advice is right on target. Exercise self-control.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Refuse to be distracted by gossipy neighbors. You need to deal with romance in a positive way. Older friends offer sound advice on handling a family problem.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You may be asked to mediate a family dispute this weekend. Your special understanding of a difficult situation helps you save the day! Do everything you can to promote reconciliation.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): The mail brings good news. An old flame could re-enter you life. Despite a nostalgic mood, you have second thoughts about rekindling your relationship. Heed your instincts!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Weigh the pros and cons of a joint shopping trip. Who will foot the bill? Attending a public meeting or gala social event gives you access to influential people.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Go ahead and splurge on a special treat today; you deserve it! Living it up a little will enhance a romantic relationship. You are lucky when it comes to finding shopping bargains.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Capitalize on your powerful financial instincts today. Act alone or pool your resources. Do not be afraid to dash ahead — you are poised to attain swift results.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): You are exceptionally persuasive today, able to win the trust and admiration of many people. Special arrangements unfold through a strong bonding or interest. Attend a family gathering tonight.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Projects and purchases will probably go just the way you like today. Social events arranged by friends take on great importance. Someone may have a secret agenda.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): An intuitive flash or confidential tip reveals how to tidy up some loose ends. Act quietly and discreetly. Those in the know will reward your efforts to straighten things out.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Prosperity follows you like a good friend now. You get the all-clear on a financial pact or purchase.

Men's track finishes ninth

Brown highlights weekend with first place finish

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

In a meet that University of Massachusetts men's track coach Ken O'Brien called "a solid performance," the Minutemen recorded a ninth place finish at this past weekend's New England Championships held at Boston University.

The meet was dominated, as expected, by the three Boston schools (Boston College, Boston University, and Northeastern), as well as the University of Connecticut and University of Rhode Island.

The highlight of the weekend for the Minutemen was the performance of Steven Brown, who brought home a first place finish in a hotly contested 500-meter race.

Brown finished the race in a time of 1:04.17, as did BU's Colm Tobin, although Brown was declared the winner in a photo finish.

"Steve's performance was definitely the highlight of the weekend," O'Brien said. "He got his nose out in front of the BU kid and edged him in what was probably the best race of the weekend."

Other key performers for the Minutemen were Kevin Walters, who grabbed a fifth place finish in the 200, and Joe Kourafas, who achieved a personal best with a sixth place finish in the pentathalon.

Also, the Minutemen's distance medley relay team of Rick Copley, Brian King, Pat Lockett, and Ben Winther impressed with a fifth place finish, as did Pat Reed with his performance in the 3000.

"I don't think that anyone in the second five [Fitchburg, Maine, Providence, Southern Connecticut, UMass] had a chance to crack that top five," O'Brien said. "I would've liked a sixth or seventh place finish, but sometimes things don't always break your way.

"I think all in all, we had a good weekend," O'Brien said. "We got some quality performances, but it's hard when you're going up against teams that are that much better than you."

might not be that ugly but he's still on the All-Uglies until he learns how to take press pictures without a grotesque scowl. Rick buddy, you're supposed to smile, not sneer.

In the frontcourt, St. Bonaventure's small forward Jason Brower is the captain of the team. Cage fans were lucky this year, in that Brower was injured when the Bonnies visited, he truly is the ugliest player in the nation.

The power forward for the All-Uglies is BC's Bill Curley. With his black mouthpiece in, Curley looks like the Jaws character in Moonraker with lighter hair.

Pitt's Darrin Morningstar is the center for this squad of Frankensteins. Morningstar will start until he realizes that his haircut is an uncontrolable mop and that his sideburns have got to go.

Well, there you have it, the NCAA All-Ugly Team for the 1991-92 season. Next column: the NBA All-Stiff team.

Minutemen guarding against deja vu

Anton Brown and the 25th-ranked University of Massachusetts basketball team will face the University of Rhode Island tonight at 7 p.m. at the Curry Hicks Cage.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

While the University of Massachusetts basketball team looks at tonight's game (Curry Hicks Cage, 7 p.m.) against the University of Rhode Island as a tune-up and a chance to earn a better NCAA tournament seeding, the Rams are up against the wall, cornered and fighting for their lives.

The Minutemen (24-4, 12-3 in the Atlantic 10) must guard against a Rhode Island team that had started off strong, only to fall in recent weeks. The Rams have exceeded most publication's preseason predictions, but have had to deal with gambling allegations at URI which have surfaced this week, while trying to stop a losing skid that may take them out of the NCAA tournament.

"I think they backed themselves in a corner when they lost a couple games there," said UMass coach John Calipari. "I'm not really surpised at their success because they've had good players, great balance, and it was just a question of whether they would put it together this year. They have, and they're having a great year."

Meanwhile, UMass must guard against history repeating itself. The Minutemen, No. 25 in the country, were upset at the Cage the last time they cracked the Top 25. The loss to West Virginia knocked them out of the polls for almost two months.

"Hopefully we learned a little bit from that experience," Calipari said. "Hopefully I learned a little bit as a coach. I was tough on them [in practice yesterday], so hopefully they know where I'm coming from."

The Minutemen are also trying to keep their New England winning streak alive. UMass is 6-0 this year against teams in New England and has won its last 16 against teams from the region.

"I think this win for [Rhode Island] would lock an NCAA tournament bid," said Calipari, who said he thinks there may be as many as four teams in the A-10 that could make the NCAAs.

The Minutemen have won eight games in a row, and 13 of their last 14. The team will look to finish strong in its last regular season home game of the year.

Calipari said that if the A-10 regular season championship banner is ready for hoisting, the game will be a sort of Fan Appreciation Night. Calipari and the UMass squad will thank the fans for their support.

KEY MATCHUPS

Harper Williams vs. Jeff Kent — In Rhode Island, Kent was quiet. However, he is a wide-body, much like Ricky Robinson of West Virginia. Wide-bodies have given Williams problems in the past and he must find a way to score inside.

Carlos Easterling vs. Anton Brown — The team whose point guard dictates tempo may very well win this game. Brown has played well all year and came up big with two 3-pointers against West Virginia. Easterling has his hands full.

Game notes: The game can be heard on WHMP (99.3 FM) and WMUA (91.1 FM).

The Atlantic 10 Tournament bus leaves Sunday morning for Philadelphia, Pa. Tickets are $99 for adults, $89 for students and $79 for Minutemaniacs. For more details contact the UMass ticket office.

David Scott fires sports shots

Here's to the guy in the bars last week with the florescent green cast on his arm with "Bird's Back" written in big black letters.

More appropriately it should have read, "Bird's Back is Back." But the guy only broke his wrist, he would of needed to shatter his leg to fit all those words. Next time.

• Who were the bozos doing the UMass-West Virginia game on Channel 22? What game were they watching?

• The rumors are starting to swirl about Coach John Calipari's future. So far he's been headed to Wichita State, Wisconsin and Southern California with others sure to follow. The further the team goes, the more rumors there will be until Coach Cal finally announces the following late in April:

"I will no longer be the head coach at UMass. I have accepted a position with the Democratic National Party as Official Tie Consultant to the Candidates," Calipari will say. "Right now, they need my expertise on neck wear. Coaching can wait, these guys are setting the tie-world back 50 years."

• The Shirl is quickly becoming a cult hero for her sports knowledge and Shirl's Pearl this week involves Roger Clemens. The Shirl is not happy.

David Scott

"Get rid of him, who needs him," The Shirl said. "He's supposed to be a leader and instead he's creating a rift with his new manager. What ever happened to the handsome pitcher, Mike Boddicker?"

The Shirl also brought up a good point, what if Clemens gets hurt? Do we blame it on his abbreviated spring training?

• The early irony in Winter Haven is that Mike Greenwell is endearing himself to the media after last year's ban on interviews and Clemens is reclaiming his bad-boy image.

• Although she'll never publicly admit it, one of my horseback riding instructors, Becky, pulled me aside in the bar and told me I'm the best rider she's seen since The Lone Ranger. Actually she said I ride like I have a mask blinding my vision, but everyone interprets things differently.

• Thirty years ago yesterday Matt Zunic's 1961-62 UMass basketball team ended its regular season with a 109-62 thrashing of the University of New Hampshire. The 15-8 "Zunicmen" then made UMass' only NCAA tournament appearance just nine days later (a 20 point loss to New York University). It's been a long time coming.

• The United Nations is considering a resolution that would make it illegal for Jim Valvano and Dick Vitale to do color commentary side-by-side. In fact the resolution goes as far as banning the two from being in the same state simultaneously. Anyone who watched the Duke-UCLA game this past Sunday knows what I'm talking about.

• As long as I can remember it's been Al Davis' Raiders and now I'm seeing signs for Ralph Nader's Raiders. When Nader speaks Sunday on campus my first question is, "What's up with Bo Jackson?"

• It's time for someone to come up with a UMass hoops song like that guy Cashman's "Talking Baseball," we'll call it "Cal's Pals" or "The Minuteman Shuffle." All right, bad idea, but this team needs more of a personality. Remember Phi Slamma Jamma?

• Coach Cal has requested that fans at tonight's game against University of Rhode Island refrain from chants and actions referring to recent gambling allegations at URI. You've got to respect Cal's plea, but taunting is part of sports.

There's a guy who sits behind the visitor's bench in the Capital Centre for Bullets' games and verbally assaults the superstars, every night. Sure it's annoying, but it's also part of sports, a part that one man alone won't change.

What is the spread tonight?

• The editor-in-chief of this paper gave this space a high praise last week and I'd like to return the favor and say his column is very entertaining as well. I'd like to say that.

• Some quick calculations reveal that slashing the Dean of the School of Physical Education David Bischoff's salary in half to $48,000 would free up close to $50,000 for my newly established scholarship fund that will enable 10 students to attend UMass free of charge.

Qualified applicants should show the ability and confidence to deal with bureaucratic hassles. Bischoff has asked that topics of discussion be submitted to him prior to agreeing to conduct an interview with The Collegian.

• ESPN never ceases to amaze me. In addition to covering over 20 basketball conference finals, the all-sports network is going to have live spring training games. Unbelievable.

• Ryne Sandberg signed a contract for $7.1 million with the Chicag Cubs. I was content winning two dollars on a scratch ticket last weekend.

• Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on the computer viruses.

Journey to a world of hoop

What should I start off with. . .hmm. . .oh yeah, let's take a trip around the NBA.

In Atlanta, the Hawks are learning how to live without injured superstar Dominique Wilkins. Different players are stepping up and performing admirably.

Power forward Kevin Willis continues to have a great year especially in the rebounding department. Duane Ferrell, a small forward out of Georgia Tech and free agent swingman Paul Graham, however, have been the biggest surprises for the Hawks.

In Los Angeles, the Lakers have fallen on hard times recently, as a recent seven game losing streak can attest. The Lakers are finally learning just how bleak life can be without Magic Johnson.

Also in L.A., Larry Brown has taken the Clippers over by storm, leading them to victory in his first six games at the helm.

Jeff Crofts

Rumor has it that Clipper forwards Danny Manning and Charles Smith get along about as well as Scottie Pippen and Dennis Rodman, so look for one of them to be moved after the season. With Brown as head coach and Ed Manning an assistant, Smith might as well put up his home for sale now. He would look mighty nice in Celtic green.

In Orlando, the Magic continue to lose, but rookie center Stanley Roberts is showing he's a bonafide NBA pivotman. Roberts got off of his see-food diet and now starts ahead of Greg Kite.

Anthony Bowie, a shooting guard refugee from the CBA has shown a scoring knack since his call-up to the Magic. Bowie was a star in college at Oklahoma in the mid-80's and now he's finally showing he can play in the NBA.

The envelope please. . .it is now time to announce my NCAA All-Ugly Team.

In the backcourt, Charles Harrison, formerly of Georgetown (he played this year so he qualifies) gets the nod at point guard. Every time he went to the free throw line for the Hoyas I cringed — Harrison is a walking billboard for Clearasil.

Meanwhile, Temple's Rick Brunson can bring his shooting skills to the other guard spot. He

Clinton visits Fla., fears Tsongas win

By JOHN KING
Associated Press

DEERFIELD BEACH, Fla. — Along Florida's "condo coast" of retirement communities, the very idea of limiting Social Security increases is political poison.

So Bill Clinton's suggestion that his chief Democratic rival might want to limit cost-of-living increases in entitlement programs drew gasps from the hundreds of retirees assembled at their poolside social hall.

Clinton's visit was part of a pre-emptive strike against Paul Tsongas, who hopes for a come-from-behind Florida win and strong showings elsewhere in the South.

Retirement communities, which include thousands of seniors from the Northeast, are one place where Tsongas has a chance to make inroads as he tries to keep Clinton from making too good a showing in next week's Super Tuesday primaries. Six of the 11 contests will be in Clinton's native South, including delegate giants Florida and Texas.

With little time and lots of catching up to do, Tsongas must choose his targets carefully. He can take cues from the lessons of years past, including 1988 Democratic nominee Michael Dukakis' successful primary campaigns in Florida and Texas.

In addition, surveys of voters in the contests held so far offer Tsongas a roadmap of the potential pockets of support in the South.

Tsongas, the former Massachusetts senator, heads into Super Tuesday with momentum from a New Hampshire win and his successful showings this week in Maryland, Utah and Washington.

"Paul doesn't needs a lot of golds," said Massachusetts Democratic Chairman Steven Grossman. "But he does need to show everywhere that he is a credible national candidate."

Eighty-five percent of Florida's population was born elsewhere, constituency includes thousands of transplants from the Northeast, including a vibrant and politically active Jewish community.

"Florida is too big for anyone in a campaign of limited resources so he can

Markuns, Moran seek 'student friendly' SGA

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the second in a two-part series profiling the candidates for Student Government President and the Student Trustee. A debate will take place on at 7 p.m. tonight in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Jeff Markuns and Christopher Moran say they are not running on a platform but instead are attempting to create an atmosphere in the Student Government Association that will be more student friendly.

Markuns, a junior zoology major, and Moran, a junior landscape architecture major are running for SGA president and Student Trustee, respectively.

"We have worked together for a year and a half now, and we need to be together to win on issues," said Moran.

"For us we aren't running on a platform of issues, we want to get the issues from the students and act upon them," said Markuns.

Markuns has held positions in student government throughout his years at UMass. He is currently the student member on the Higher Education Coordinating Council, the board overseeing higher education in Massachusetts, the chair of the Residential Student Association and the Resident Committee and is a student senator. He was also the president of the Orchard Hill Area Government in 1991, and has served on the Grayson House Council.

Moran has gained political experience not only from UMass, but from the outside as well. He was the Stockbridge class president from 1989 to 1991, a student senator from 1990 to the present and has also served as the Sylvan Area president.

In 1988-1989, Moran served on the Framingham School Committee as the student representative.

They are not running on a issues platform, but there are two common issues that they say that they can resolve by working together.

The first issue is bringing the Area Governments and House Councils into the student senate.

"We feel that House Council and Area Governments work for the students, and we want to bring that same organizational style to the senate," said Markuns.

"We want to get rid of the partisan politics in the senate, and fill all the seats in the student senate with real students working on real issues," said Markuns.

The second issue, which is more of a goal, is to set up better negotiating tactics with the administration and lobbying efforts among students.

"You don't jump up and down screaming your head off, you negotiate and lobby effectively," said Markuns.

"I plan not only working with all the other higher education public schools, through the Student Advisory Committee, to get the masses back out and winning," said Moran.

"As president I want to help Registered Student Organizations, from the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance to the Republican Club to Union Program Council, to accomplish their mission and carry out their goals," said Markuns.

Also in the race for Student President is Jennifer Wood. Kevin Newnan is seeking re-election as Student Trustee.

PC virus may go off Friday

Michelangelo virus lurking in computers nationwide

By BART ZIEGLER
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Like a mugger hiding in the closet, the Michelangelo virus is lurking in personal computers nationwide awaiting Friday's trigger date.

Companies, government agencies and schools are taking precautions, but experts said Wednesday not every computer can be examined in time and the invader will do some damage.

"We can't go out and inspect every PC on every desk," said Andy Myers, a spokesman for American Telephone & Telegraph Co., which has a quarter of a million personal computers.

Experts say the virus surfaced about a year ago in Europe, though its exact origins are unknown.

"You're more likely to spill a cup of coffee on your keyboard than to get this virus," said Peter Tippett, chairman of Certus International Inc., a maker of anti-virus software.

"There's definitely hysteria," said Marianne Guntow, a computer analyst at the University of Chicago. "We get people that call up and are absolutely panicked, and after talking to them for a while we find out they have a Macintosh [computer] and aren't affected at all."

The virus has been found sitting dormant inside IBM-type personal computers awaiting the PC's internal clock to reach March 6, the birthday of the Italian Renaissance artist. Once the PC is turned on that day, the virus can destroy programs and data on the computer's hard disk.

Viruses are rogue pieces of computer software devised by pranksters. They can enter a PC through software contained on a diskette or transmitted to the computer over the phone from a computer "bulletin board" or other source.

A survey of 300 major businesses taken by Dataquest Inc., a high-tech market research firm, found the infection rate for all computer viruses rose from 5.5 percent at the end of 1991 to 18.2 percent at the end of January.

Some companies and organizations that are extremely cautious about what software is used in their PCs believe

Mass. doctor to rid boy of tattoo

BERRYVILLE, Va. (AP) — A doctor has offered to remove a tattoo from a 7-year-old boy who said his uncle and father held him down and tattooed the letters "B-I-L-L-Y" on his arm.

Dr. Joop Grevelink of the Dermatology Laser Center at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston wrote a newspaper offering to remove Billy Dennison's tattoo at no charge.

The boy's uncle, Jimmy Dennison, 23, was convicted last month of malicious wounding. The boy's father, Willie Dennison, 29, later pleaded guilty to a charge of unlawful wounding. The brothers are to be sentenced on April 7.

The jury recommended that Jimmy Dennison spend 12 months in jail and pay a $2,500 fine.

According to a plea agreement, which has not been approved by Circuit Judge James Berry, Willie Dennison would be sentenced to one year of a two-year prison term and be required to pay for the removal of the tattoo.

A copy of Grevelink's letter was sent Clarke County Commonwealth's Attorney Geoffrey Cole, who said the letter states: "If interested, we will pay for (Billy to come up here and treat him for free."

Although a plea agreement with Willie Dennison would require him to pay into a fund to cover expenses for the removal of the tattoo, Cole said the money could be converted to another fund for the child if the procedure is performed at no charge.

Grevelink's head nurse, Donna Gabriel, said the procedure requires several monthly visits and normally costs $500 for the initial treatment and $250 for subsequent visits.

Grads plan trip to fight tuition hike

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Employee Organization is getting its guns together with the Graduate Student Senate to fight for a better University of Massachusetts.

The recent news of a proposed 4 percent tuition increase has GEO and Senate members incensed and concerned about the University's future, and they are calling for University undergraduates to mobilize.

"Tuition raises have been going on for too long," said GEO co-speaker Peter Underdown. "Students have to speak out about how they feel about what's going on."

The proposed tuition increase, which includes an equal increase in mandatory curriculum fees, must be approved by the Higher Education Coordinating Council. The council will meet next Friday in Boston to discuss the tuition issue, and GEO and the Graduate Student Senate are campaigning to get students to the meeting.

The last time tuition was not raised was 1965. Since then, tuition has risen an average of 7.5 percent per year.

For the current academic year, tuition is $2,052 for in-state and $7,920 for out-of-state students. Under the proposed 4 percent increase, tuition will rise to $2,134 in-state and $8,237 for out-of-state.

Although the increase compared to the past few years is not a large one, the concern is that continued tuition increases take pressure off the state to provide adequate funding for the school.

Buses will depart Friday morning from the Haigus Mall to transport graduates and undergraduates to the Department of Education building in Boston. Graduate Student Senate President Marc Kenen and Underdown hope that students will be prepared to share their experiences of the personal impact the past tuition raises have had on them.

"The best thing the students could possibly do for themselves now is to come to Boston to speak out," said Kenen. "We want them to tell about friends that have been unable to come back to the University, about how they themselves are struggling."

If students are unable to attend the Boston meeting, Kenen and Underdown urge them to send a letter to the

Playwright addresses alma mater

Smith grad describes her road to success in theater

By OLIVIA STEWART-LIBERTY
Collegian Staff

Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Wendy Wasserstein told a packed Smith College audience Tuesday how it is to be "a playwright, a woman playwright, a Jewish woman playwright and a Jewish woman playwright who studied here."

Describing herself as of "a good Jewish family from Brooklyn," Wasserstein recalled her early love of the theater. She said her mother regularly took her to musicals on Broadway after her compulsory dancing class, all to ensure Wasserstein grew up to be "well-rounded."

"My mother showed no interest in my brother Bruce becoming well-rounded, only me," Wasserstein said. "And, well, it went directly to my hips," she retorted as she lounged against the lectern.

Wasserstein said she wrote her first script at her New York high school for girls.

"I wanted to get out of gym so I agreed to write the script for the annual mother-daughter fashion show."

A history major at Mount Holyoke College, Wasserstein recalled auditioning for a production of Lysistrada. Of the play's director Wasserstein said only this: "I hate him, it was a terrible production." She clarified such strength of feeling by explaining that she was asked to play "the fat girl."

Wasserstein's big break came when her friend Ruth suggested, "We can take play-writing at Smith and then go shopping."

"For the first time in my life I realized you could get credit for doing something you liked, instead of just being well-rounded," Wasserstein said.

Wasserstein left college for the Yale School of Drama. "For the first time I was dealing with a male-driven

Schools called 'economic strength'

By SARAH VOISIN
Collegian Correspondent

The new regional director of the Massachusetts Small Business Development Center believes that the Five College educational institutes are one of the major economic strengths in Western Massachusetts.

Dianne Fuller Doherty, a Mount Holyoke graduate, was named as regional director of the center in January.

Doherty says the schools provide jobs and "skilled graduates who are bright and beneficial to the job force." She hopes to create an atmosphere in this region where graduates will want to remain.

As regional director for the SBDC, Doherty will oversee the center's Western Massachusetts regional office in Springfield.

The mission of the SBDC, Doherty said, "is to engage in individual counseling, training and economic development activities that contribute to the improvement of the economic climate for small businesses."

"The SBDC's focus will be the maintenance of, and the creation of, viable small businesses and the jobs the businesses create," she said.

Doherty said the SBDC is able to meet the needs of small businesses through a program of management assistance that utilizes the resources of the academic community, the government and the private sector.

After spending the first weeks of her new position listening to people, Doherty has several goals for the organization. The first goal is to "offer counseling and training activities and programs to small businesses." She hopes to do this through the resources of the "educational, public and private sector."

Doherty says there are many ways for small businesses to get assistance, however they don't know how to use the resources.

Her second goal is "to develop an economic environment in Western Massachusetts that nurtures and supports entrepreneurialism and the growth of small business."

The final goal is to cultivate awareness among the private leadership about the importance of small business to the future of this region.

The program's state director, John Ciccarelli, said Doherty "has a real understanding of starting and successfully advising a small business, marketing knowledge which is critical to survive in today's economy, a proven ability to bring diverse groups together for a common purpose and an outstanding reputation within the business community."

Doherty, a Longmeadow resident, is the former president and chief executive officer of Doherty-Tzoumas Marketing Inc. of Springfield. Prior to this she was executive director of Downtown Springfield Marketing, Inc. This organization initiated such annual events as Springfield's holiday lighting program, A Taste of Springfield, and the Thanksgiving Giant Balloon Parade.

Doherty has also been active in many civic organizations. Since 1990 she has chaired the Greater Springfield Chamber of Commerce's Small Business Committee and she currently

Alumnus screenwriter recounts UM memories

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

"Peyton Place" screenwriter and University of Massachusetts' alumnus John Michael Hayes recounted the numerous colorful experiences he had while on the Amherst campus in the 1940s as well as his adventures in Hollywood.

A two-time Academy Award nominee, Hayes first broke into the burgeoning radio industry. He wrote for the "Lucille Ball Show," "Amos and Andy," "The Adventures of Sam Spade" and numerous other radio shows.

He has also written screenplays for movies including "Peyton Place," "The Man Who Knew Too Much, "Walking Tall" and "Butterfield 8."

"So many memories, mostly small and personal, flood back to me — the beauty of the campus, especially in the fall and spring and the warmth and helpfulness of my classmates and fraternity brothers at Lambda Alpha Chi," he said.

"I hated to leave, but I had to go on with my life," he said.

He worked his way through college as a reporter for the Worcester Telegram, as well as writing feature stories for The Boston Globe.

"He is probably the most fascinating man I have ever met in my in my life," said Jamie Zazzaro, a senior communications major and president of Club Communications.

After graduating in 1941 with a bachelors degree in economics, and a minor in English, Hayes worked in the radio industry as a writer in Cincinnati.

He later worked for Proctor and Gamble's radio department, as well as the company's chief competitor, Lever Brothers.

John Michael Hayes, a screenwriter of such hits as, "Peyton Place," is a University of Massachusetts graduate.

"Getting into movies, I did not think much about, because I always wanted to be a playwright," Hayes said.

He was drafted by the Army's Special Service Branch after working in Cincinnati, where he was put in charge of four theaters.

After years in the radio business, he decided to go work in the Hollywood motion picture industry as a screenwriter, even though the pay was less lucrative.

"I knew that I would go farther in pictures," Hayes said.

He worked on five movies with the late Alfred Hitchcock who is famous for his spine tingling, suspense movie thrillers.

Zazzaro summed up Hayes visit to UMass, "In this one day, I have learned so much from him about screenwriting and life."

Trustees aren't trusty

Those not-so-trusty University of Massachusetts Trustees are talking out of both sides of their mouths. . . again.

It turns out some of the Trustees who were against tuition hikes couldn't make the Board's meeting in Worcester last Friday. That's a shame, because the others who supposedly were against the 4 percent raise turned around and voted for it anyway. What looked like the promise of real progress turned out to be little more than one big come-on.

Greg Sukiennik

You know what they call the kind of people who make come-ons. Use your imagination.

Trustees chairperson Gordon Oakes talked about sending a message to the Statehouse by only raising tuition 4 percent. He argued that by only raising tuition by a small percentage, the Trustees would come up with necessary funds without letting the state off the hook. As he put it, "the idea is that we'll do our part here, but the state has got to do it's part."

Okay, Gordo, next question: how do the Trustees expect a state which spends less money on students than virtually any other in the nation to suddenly come up with the money? Especially when the Trustees raise tuition anyway? A tuition hike allows the state to wash it's hands of responsibility for UMass. Just like Pilate.

What's a 4 percent increase, anyway? To business types like the Trustees, 4 percent is a pittance. But to middle-class types like you and me, 4 percent could be the difference between UMass or working at home at Guido's Fresh Marketplace.

You may well ask, "Who are these people anyway?" It just so happens I have a list of the Trustees, and their occupations. A few are average people like you and me. Some are University officials, such as our own Chancellor Richard O'Brien and President E.K. Fretwell. Others are student trustees like Kevin Newnan, who must be commended for unconditionally opposing any tuition hike. Unfortunately, the chancellors don't vote, and only two of five student trustees do.

Then there's the business lobby. "The economic profile of the Trustees is anything but average," Newnan said. It should come as no surprise that much of the board was appointed by our orange-headed pal in Boston, Gov. William Weld.

Of the eight mis-Trustees who voted for the increase, six are affiliated with, or in charge of, major firms and corporations, mostly in the Boston area. For instance, there's Robert S. Karam of Karam Financial Group in Fall River. The Karam Group is one of the state's financial powers-that-be. Not quite the type who would naturally identify with the middle-class.

The Board's other esteemed vice-chair is Alan D. Solomont, who is president of ADS Management, Inc. in North Andover. Other "movers and shakers" who voted for tuition increases are Daniel Taylor of the law firm of Hill and Barlow in Boston — not exactly Perry Mason's office, mind you — and Daniel Bogan of Borden and Remington Corp. in Fall River.

Then there's Rina K. Spence, president and CEO of Emerson Hospital. Spence was, like Oakes, originally against the tuition hike but mysteriously voted for it anyway. What changed their minds? Pressure from the other big-wigs, perhaps?

Don't you think with all the fabulous wealth and corporate influence so many of the Trustees have, they could have tried harder to pressure the state to fund us instead of turning on the students whose interests they are supposed to serve?

Oakes said he was worried a tuition increase larger than 4 percent would price UMass out of the market. Where has he been? UMass is already way too expensive for a school with a declining physical plant and a woefully underfunded library. True, the money has to come from somewhere, but haven't we paid enough?

Hating men or surviving?

Hate. A powerful word usually reserved for strong emotions, these days it's often used by men to trivialize feminist criticism in the same way conservatives use the expression "PC" to dismiss progressive ideas and values.

Trystan Skeigh

Feminists are just a bunch of rabid "man-haters," men say with a sneer. But feminism isn't really about hating men. It's about women working to free women from oppression. Feminists are disliked because they raise a lot of issues a lot of men would rather not think about — like rape. Studies and statistics reveal this society is predicated upon sexual aggression against women.

For example, a 1981 survey by Briere, Malamuth and Ceniti revealed 60 percent of college males say they would rape a woman if they felt sure they wouldn't get caught. In 1985 researchers found over 75 percent of college females have experienced sexual aggression during a date. According to a 1986 report by Kathleen Alexander, one out of every four women will be the victim of rape at some point during their lives, and half of all women will be subjected to a rape attempt.

It is painfully clear we live in a rape culture in which men are socialized to believe sex should involve force. The United States has the dubious distinction of leading the world in rape.

Yet when feminists attempt to discuss this reality, they're usually labeled "manhating dykes" (regardless of their orientation) and jeered out of the room by men.

It's obvious this discussion isn't really about women hating men. It's about why men behave in this culture as if they hate women. It's impossible to ignore this patriarchal society's glorification of male sexual conquest. Rape and sexual aggression are frequently depicted in movies, books and magazines. Even our most popular slang centers around rape euphemisms.

However, science reveals human sexuality does not require a dominant-submissive dynamic. These behaviors are learned. Anthropological studies have identified human societies, like the Arapesh, where rape is nonexistent. In this culture gentleness, mutual respect and caring were the dominant values observed between men and women. This observation proves male sexual aggression is a result of social conditioning, rather than an innate biological drive.

It's time men stopped jeering and started listening to the feminist "man-haters." American men need to take responsibility for perpetuating machismo values that perpetuate sexual aggression and rape. It is up to men to discover a new sexual dynamic.

Although it's true not all men in this society actively oppress women, in a patriarchy it's not enough for some "sensitive men" to quietly exist in unobtrusive nonconformity. This silence becomes complicity. Men who understand the dangerous implications of male sexual dominance need to strive to open the eyes of their less-enlightened brothers.

It's crucial for men to stop going into denial when feminists discuss male sexual violence against women. The facts are crystal clear and need to be dealt with. Those who charge lesbian feminists with "recruiting" should reconsider this knee-jerk response. Lesbian thinkers are uniquely situated to analyze and question the existing sexual dynamics between men and women because they exist outside this sexual paradigm.

Rape is a physically violent torture of the human spirit that leaves deep, permanent scars on the psyches of its victims. In order for it to end, men and women need to be willing to listen to the constructive criticism offered by feminists.

Men who say they love and care about women should work to create a world where women are safe from sexual violence.

Trystan Skeigh is a* Collegian *columnist

Guess what, feminists?

A quick perusal of the fliers decorating our self-consciously happy valley (or the graffiti decorating our bathroom stalls) will provide ample proof that gender symbols have become the trendy way to indicate one's gender and sexual preference. Of course, with the advent of fashionable bisexuality, decoding these combined symbols has taken on the mental challenge of an IQ test. How fast can you translate this series of symbols into the actual image you'd find in that individual's bed? Be quick about it — the opportunity to casually mention your genius IQ to each new acquaintance rests on this.

Robin Weaver

I must confess, at the risk of revealing my sub-genius IQ, that the combination with the two girl symbols and the one boy symbol all joined together puzzles me. Do people of this persuasion simply have sex with both men and women? Or is it a symbol for that long-oppressed breed of male who can only have sex with two women at once? Frankly, there's something vaguely indecent about this combination — it conjures up images of late-night Cinemax soft-porn from Australia that's been dubbed with American accents.

But let us step back for a moment, take a historical perspective (and not the popular "We Are The Oppressed" one), and look at what these individual gender symbols really represent. The guy one. . . well, holy cow, it's an erect phallus. So men are characterized by their sex drive. . . I think that's quite fitting. And in this era and area saturated with male guilt, who's going to argue that it's degrading? Most guys probably secretly like the idea anyway.

The female symbol is another matter entirely. Politically correct logic dictates that the feminist sector should be rejecting their given gender symbol rather than proudly displaying it in the form of socially conscious jewelry. After all, its origin is quite patronizing to women. It's the symbol of a mirror, thus indicating that women are characterized principally by their vanity. No argument here, but it seems like there should be some from the feminists, since they've already enthusiastically taken up the fight against the English language with truly laudable moves like re-spelling "woman" to get that damned "man" out and making awkward and stupid sounding words like "waitperson" fairly standard, at least in "responsible" society.

Of course, it would look silly (or sillier) if feminists suddenly began attacking the symbol they've so vainly (see?) embraced, and besides, the lesbian badge of two female symbols joined together is just too cute to forsake merely on principle.

But keeping in mind the origins of gender symbols, what would the lesbian sign really mean? Twice the vanity of your regular gal? Or the less-cute-but-still-functional homosexual male sign? Twice the sex drive? Or the bisexual sign? Twice the vanity and sex drive? Ah ha! Sure it would be dreadfully irresponsible to try to define groups of people by some sketchy analysis of their gender and sexuality symbols, but since nobody knows how to spell "woman" anymore, and since "differently sexually oriented" is too hard to remember, symbols are all I have to play with. (Set-up for the very cutting-I'm-sure lesbo comeback, "You'd have more to play with if you tried lesbian sex." Yeah, yeah. . . I am woman, hear me snore.)

A farewell to a loyal pal

This column is dedicated to Edna.

You never know what you've got 'till it's gone.

Last week I said good-bye to a very dear friend of almost three years.

My parents introduced us at the end of my freshman year of college. I was a little suspicious of her at first, because of how she looked. Unfortunately, when you don't know someone, your only impression of them stems from their initial outward appearance. And, well, to be honest, Edna was no looker.

Felice Cohen

Actually, her real name wasn't even Edna. That was just a nickname I gave her. Turns out it stuck. Everyone called her Edna after that.

I remember that summer well. We spent it together traveling everywhere. I introduced her to my friends and Edna was well received by all. I mean, what was not to like? She was friendly, never bad mouthed anyone and always willing to help out in any way she could. Even my little sister liked her, though she thought Edna had a funny smell.

When it was time for me to go back to UMass, Edna came too. I didn't know it then, but she had been planning to come all along.

Edna just loved Amherst, though I was never quite sure how she felt about the long drive. Yet once up at school, whenever I needed to go anywhere, she was more than willing to drive me and never complained. I introduced her to my UMass friends who would greet her, "Hi Edna, you look great." I think Edna really liked that.

Over the next few years, Edna and I became inseparable. Eventually, those appearances that at first I unfairly judged her by, were no longer obvious to me. I confided in her about my life and she was always more than willing to listen. She was very receptive to my feelings.

When it comes to friends, the ones who stay by your side no matter what, are the greatest. Edna was no exception. No matter the weather, my mood or how tired I was, she was always there for me. We had been through a lot together. She was with me the time I got my very first speeding ticket and also when I got into a little fender bender in town. And she was always correct in saying that neither incidents were my fault.

Edna was generally in a good mood. No matter what, she'd be rearing and ready to go at any time of the day. I could always count on her to come through.

Yet last semester I began to see a change in Edna. She had not been acting her old self and I was worried. Taking her to see her private doctor, Mike, I was hoping it would do the trick. Was I right. For when I picked her up, she was flashing a great big smile.

But last week our friendship was cut short. Edna had to leave.

The night she left is still very clear in my mind. The doorbell rang, announcing her ride had arrived. Hesitating to answer it, I opened the door. For weeks previous, I had tried preparing myself, for I knew that eventually we'd have to go our separate ways.

I never imagined the time would come so soon and hurt so much. Here she was, heading off to live with someone else and I would probably never see her again.

Yes, I still have many pictures of the two of us on "road trips," weathering through storms and singing along to the radio. With all these memories, she will inevitably remain a part of my life.

As Edna drove away down the dimly lit street, a few tears fell down my cheek, as I stood watching the red tail lights of the first car I ever owned, putt putt away.

'American' is difficult to define

I am responding to Jeff Hojlo, whose column, "Buying American is clutch" appeared in the March 2 Collegian.

While I have no doubt that Jeff's intentions are sincere, his proposal is nonetheless faulty and misguided.

In order to "buy American" we need to define what an American-made product is.

Is it a product made by a U.S.-based company, regardless of whether any or all of the product was actually manufactured in the United States?

A product built by U.S. workers even if employed by a foreign company? A product constructed of foreign-made parts but assembled in the United States or vice-versa?

The difficulty in defining "American-made" reflects the deeper reality that capitalism has become a highly integrated global system.

The degree to which national identity continues to play a part is largely the ensuant conflict between competing capitalists.

The executives who are plugging the most recent "buy American" sentiment are the same people who think nothing of closing down shops and displacing workers in the United States so that they can procure cheaper wage slaves in other countries.

Capitalism is inherently predatory.

Its fundamental law of survival is that it must export, penetrate other markets and exploit the lowest possible production costs and most profitable investment opportunities.

That is why it is such a massive global parasite today, and also why "buying American" can neither solve nor even reduce the inherent crises of overproduction and subsequent catastrophes resulting from an outmoded and harmful economic system.

For those of you who have been duped into believing that socialism is dead, I argue that something cannot die if it has never lived.

With capitalism rapidly approaching industrial feudalism, I strongly urge everyone to learn what real socialism is, thereby assisting the human race in its evolutionary process.

Columnist needs to find a clue

To the future ex-husband of Winona Westcott: Tony, do I detect a twinge of jealousy? Do you really loathe couples in love showing their affection in public or the symbolicy (a spelling err of my own kind) of the words "boyfriend/girlfriend?"

I, myself, have come to disregard these words as well as "significant other," not as words of possession but as terms to describe two members of a couple having a relationship. Agreed, that individuals partaking in this act of relating-ship appear to be in a state of "twitter-pation" (courtesy of Friend Owl in "Bambi") and perhaps their rational intellect may be a little distorted and offensive to some but to go so far as to say that "lovers are a pretty pathetically simple-minded, unoriginal group of non-thinkers" is totally asinine. Are you implying that persons with the same mentality as yourself are a pretty apathetically empty-headed, analogous group of ignoramuses? Agreed?

Your reference to boyfriend/girlfriend as a possession or property can only be understood as a by-product of past experiences. And that's too bad!

Love is a rarity, something quite special and unique. Possession is hardly a term I would choose to describe such an incredible and intense feeling.

Your preoccupation with love boggles my mind.

After reading your last three articles, I found a bit of inconsistency and am slightly confused with your intentions. Whatever happened to "Love is all around, come on and let it show," and "Personally, I'm all for engaging in this preferred companionship/physical pleasure thing (call me a hopeless romantic)." Hey Tony! Maybe you should follow your own advice and GET A LIFE!

Yo! Save our planet, people!

Yo! Save the planet.

If that sentence sounds familiar to you, you must have seen a poster and may even have attended MassPIRG's general interest meeting.

Last week, almost 100 students came to Earthfoods to get involved in issues ranging from hunger and homelessness to voter registration.

I was impressed not only by the attendance but by the enthusiasm that filled the room.

That energy and interest was converted to activism almost immediately. Out of that meeting, a petition drive began to place a question on the Student Government ballot on March 10 and 11. In just over a week, nearly 3,000 students signed the petition in order to reaffirm support for the $4 waivable fee that funds the MassPIRG chapter here. Every two to four years, we petition in order to bring this question before the students.

This fee is the only one on our tuition bills that we vote for. It is also the only one that builds student power and creates social change by hiring staff and networking with other colleges to work on environmental and consumer issues.

I would like to thank everyone who came to the meeting as well as everyone who has given their support to MassPIRG by signing the petition.

I'm looking forward to an exciting semester full of activity to fight hunger, promote recycling, educate voters and protect student rights.

As active students and citizens, we really can save the planet.

It makes me feel like I'm a man when I put a spike into my vein

Don't think that it can't happen to you just because you're a White, middle-class college student with a 3.0 G.P.A. that comes from a good family, who has everything you could want, because that's a load of crap.

I started doing heroin, with a friend, last summer. Nobody forced it on me, I'm not from an inner city, and it didn't come to me. I went looking for it. I was down, and looking for a new rush, and what a rush it was for me.

Every time I stuck that needle in my arm, I felt like a firestorm rushed through my body, burning away my troubles, lighting up my passions. Yeah, I felt all right, I felt powerful, I felt big, bigger than God.

It was a once in a while thing to me then, something to do when I wanted to have an extra-special Friday night out with the boys.

Shoot up, smoke some butts, ride our motorcycles, go to a party and sit in the corner, all aloof drinking ginger ale because alcohol would make us puke.

Let's not kid ourselves, some drugs have that living fast, dying young air about them. For me, heroin was it. A way to have a fast time. There was nothing like flying down the interstate at 110 mph on my motorcycle with a girl on my back and smack coursing through my veins.

Then as subtle as the sun passing overhead, it became the only way to spend Friday night, and Saturday night and Sunday morning, I scraped my bags to get a little wake-up rush. I began to realize that I was doing it a little too much, so I decided to stop altogether, and I succeeded for a little while.

Then I ran into it again, and I didn't do it for fun anymore. I did it because the sight or mention of it made me shake with excitement and craving.

I did it every day. I went to classes on it, I went to parties on it, and nobody knew because I did it behind a locked door, all the time. I kept my needle and my spoon and my rubber arm tie all boxed up, nice and neat where nobody would find it. If I could find nothing else in my room, I always knew where my works were.

Then I realized that I no longer did it to feel good, but I did it to avoid feeling bad. Yeah, the hook was in. So I quit again until the next time I ran into it.

I looked at the guy who was getting it for us. Thirty years old with wrinkles the size of canyons, and eyes so far sunk that they looked like they were hung on the back of his head.

I looked at myself, Mr. 3.0, White, middle-class, good family guy whom everybody's parents thought was a great kid, waiting under a yellow street lamp in downtown Holyoke for my connection to show up, and I knew it was time to change. So I quit again, for a little while.

Then I ran into it again. Without hesitation, I had a few new holes in my arm, and I knew that I had screwed up, again. Now I've quit again and I've got help this time. Mostly just a few friends, but that's what friends are for, right?

Maybe this time I won't fall down. Maybe I will. If I had just stayed the hell away from it, and not thought that it couldn't happen to me, I wouldn't be worrying about it.

I just want to say that if you're scared of heroin, good. You damn well better be, and if you're not, then smarten the hell up. This isn't a beer on Friday night or a joint after class. It's a lot easier to end up where I am than you imagine.

If you're doing it now, get some help. Go to Health Services, or to Narcotics Anonymous, go to your family, go to your friends. It's a lot easier to explain to them that you need help than it will be for them to explain to each other why you didn't ask for any when you're nothing but an ugly corpse with a rotten, hole-filled arm.

Life's hard enough, don't be an idiot and go making it any harder.

Notes from the Campus Center basement

Hello all, here's my second installment of notes. Its not that my first effort was such a success, it's just hard to find good replacements on such short notice.

Seeing the semester's first edition of The Minuteman deposited around campus in little piles (am I conjuring up the right image here?) assuaged my fears of not having enough material this week, so here goes.

I'm from Danvers, which just happens to be the same hometown as Minuteman high-priest, Ted Maravelias. That's quite a dubious distinction. Danvers is a depressing little North Shore suburb full of shopping malls and teenagers who drive Camaros with Confederate flag vanity plates. So, the next time he's saying something laughable about traditional, family values give the poor guy a break, he's just the product of his depraved environment.

Only in the Happy Valley can clean-cut, college-educated white-breads claim to be an oppressed minority. Look for them at the noon rally on the Student Union steps when they get Student Activities Trust Fund funding for a UMass chapter of Young Eugenicists for Genocide (press onward, Christian soldiers). Also, look for me in their next issue under "Jeers."

As for the rest of the staff, I'll leave them be. That's would be like trying to lampoon professional wrestling. They don't need my help, they're doing just fine.

No Graffiti of the week. The bathroom literature I've seen lately pertains mostly to glandular things, and the particularly nasty oral habits of Whitmore (especially the financial aid office). You can do better than that.

Josh Reynolds

There was an Associated Press article in the New York Times about the Detroit Free Press last week. It seems that the paper did an expose on high levels of toxic chemicals in new development complexes. In response, an angry developer tested the newspaper itself according to Environmental Protection Agency standards for the disposal of solid wastes. It failed. I don't know what happened to the developer, but the Detroit Free Press' response is worth repeating.

"Unless readers ingest the pages of the newspaper or chew on the pages, or rub them all over themselves they should not get any adverse results," said their technolegal nerd Paul Volpe.

I never looked at it that way before. All these years that I've limited myself to just reading the paper I've been missing out on a big part of the print media experience.

Newsprint is an excellent source of dietary fiber, and the ink makes a fine substitute for black mascara. Newsprint's natural absorbency makes it an obvious alternative to a bath towel or facial cloth as well as in more traditional applications such as under the parakeet or new puppy.

I propose that we do our own little toxicity test right here; Ingest this article after reading. If a rash develops, please discontinue use.

Now let's talk about the content of these newspapers, that's the stuff that's really dangerous. Take the New York Times for example. Should I trust the judgement of a paper that considers itself too grown-up to run even political cartoons? Should I trust the integrity of a paper that runs ads for oil corporations and defense contractors on its editorial page? That's the stuff I have a hard time swallowing.

That's all for now, but if you've got any questions, answers or pithy comments please send them to me at 113 Campus Center Basement. Better yet, drop them off in person. Try me, I've got an excuse for everything. Or, I can forward it to Trystan or Michael Morrissey with the rest of the mail.

hit the condos and the Jewish community," said Democratic consultant Vic Kamber. "You have to pick and choose but there are opportunities for him."

It was success in these groups that helped Dukakis to his win four years ago — and one of the reasons Clinton was courting both constituencies Tuesday in advance of expected Tsongas forays.

A new poll showed Clinton leading Tsongas 27 percent to 21 percent, but a large undecided block remains. A plurality in the polls agreed with Tsongas' characterization of a Clinton-backed middle class tax cut as a "gimmick."

Already, a Clinton television ad mentions a Tsongas proposal to limit cost of living increases for entitlements and he brings it up on the stump as well.

Tsongas makes the case for keeping COLAs at 1 percent below inflation in his detailed economic book, saying such a reduction is "not a great deal but would establish a policy of economic response."

school," she said, explaining her unhappiness at this time "because of how women were portrayed in plays."

"I wanted to write a play which had women on the stage who were closer to the ones I knew," Wasserstein said.

Uncommon Women and Others was Wasserstein's first great success. It ran at the Phoenix theater, New York for two and a half weeks. Wasserstein said that she then sold the play to public television: "I am one of the few playwrights you will meet who made a three-figure deal. Because I wanted to hold onto that play.

"NBC wanted to buy the play and change the original cast, to put in Charlie's Angels types — my ultimate revenge on Mount Holyoke — but I couldn't do it to the play," Wasserstein said.

Since then Wasserstein has written the extremely successful Isn't it Romantic and the Pulizer prize-winning The Heidi Chronicles. Wasserstein said she has certainly had her share of rejections also.

Wasserstein's advice to aspiring playwrights is "Write. The most important thing is to keep writing. If you think its a good idea, then it is a good idea. And don't tell too many people about it, opinions will always be different. Start with the characters." Wasserstein advised.

"It's worth it in life to take a risk, to do what you want to do... and not to do it is heart-breaking."

Wasserstein said that the way into the world of theater usually comes from "someone who knows someone who knows someone." It was through the secretary of the dance school which she was forced to attend as a child that Wasserstein acclaims her first stage production.

The lecture was part of the 19th Annual Jewish Arts Festival, sponsored by the Amherst/Smith Hillel foundation.

serves on the board of directors of WGBY-TV/Channel 57 and the World Affairs Council. Last July, she traveled to Japan with former Springfield Mayor Mary Hurley to develop cultural and trade relations with Springfield's sister city, Takikawa City.

The SBDC is a partnership of the U.S. Small Business Administration, the Massachusetts Executive Office of Economic Affairs, and a consortium of higher education institutions led by the University of Massachusetts at Amherst and including Boston College and Clark University.

Doherty says the center's services to small businesses have grown in importance along with the growth of small business in the nation. Between 1980, the year which the SBDC was initiated, and 1989, she said, the number of small businesses increased by 54 percent. These businesses are now responsible for 38 percent of the Gross National Product.

THIS WEEKEND

Can't wait 'til Friday to see 'Til Tuesday

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

It's been a long time since the name 'Til Tuesday has been a topic of conversation. This band, artisans of that popular, gold album Voices Carry, is playing this weekend at Pearl Street in Northampton. 'Til Tuesday won MTV's "Best New Artist Award" that year, 1985.

Their last album, Everything's Different Now, was the culmination of two years of change and growth for the band. The core of the band is Aimee Mann, on lead vocals, bass, guitars, and Michael Hausmann (on drums, percussion).

The band's original keyboardist, Joey Pesce, left 'Til Tuesday prior to the start of the sessions for that last album. Guitarist Robert Holmes played on the album, but later left to form his own group shortly after its completion.

Their new keyboard player, Michael Montes, is "able to give the songs a more rhythmic framework," explains Mann.

On that last album their influences could be traced to mid-Sixties folk-rock and the diverse works of the modern singer/songwriters. The ballad "Telescope" was co-written by Aimee and Elvis Costello, who shares the lead vocal.

The song "J is for Jules" was obviously inspired by Mann's past relationship with singer/songwriter Jules Shear. The title song, "Everything's Different Now," was written by (none other than) Jules Shear, with Matthew Sweet.

Aimee Mann arrived in Boston in 1978. After leaving Berklee College of Music, she formed her first working band, the Young Snakes. The group split after two years, and in 1982 'Til Tuesday was born. In 1984 the band won first place in WBCN's annual "Rock and Roll Rumble," which led to their Epic signing.

'Til Tuesday with Aimee Mann will play at Pearl St. in Northampton on Friday, March 6. Tickets are $10 in advance and $11 at the door. The show begins at 7 pm.

My Bloody Valentine's a pain in the, uh, ears

By SUZY HERRING
and SETH DITCHIK
Special to the Collegian

My Bloody Valentine wants to hurt you.

This half Scottish, half English band has been touring with "local favorite" Dinosaur Jr. in support of their latest release, Loveless. Saturday night at the Ritz in New York City, MBV guitarists/singers Bilinda Butcher and Kevin Shields erected a wall of ethereal grunge-noise, backed up by bassist Deb Googe and drummer Colm O'Coisoig, with the intent to damage both mind and body through sound.

My Bloody Valentine is being heralded as "The Next Big Thing," a title held by Dinosaur Jr. not long ago. MBV's last album, Isn't Anything, released in 1988, pioneered what would later be dubbed "dream-pop," as practiced by Lush, Ride and a host of other late comers. Loveless, built on a foundation of carefully sculpted feedback, sample guitar noise, and blissed-out voices, carries it all one step further. But even our devoted listening to this album did not prepare us for Saturday's tour de force.

We entered the Ritz, escaping the bitter cold and the luckless soul offering "'shrooms for tickets" to the sold-out show. After a few minutes of waiting, the giant video screens in front of the stage lifted, and opening band The Screaming Trees began to churn out skilled but unremarkable "alternative" rock. Soon, the screens returned.

After an eternity (it seemed), the screens were lifted once again, and My Bloody Valentine hit us with the first chords of their unique glide-guitar sound. You'd never know just by looking at them that hippyish Butcher and R.E.M.-esque Sheilds could be so loud. The music broke like waves: it was all we could do just to stay on our feet. Behind them, savage abstract imagery pulsed and throbbed-alternatingly hypnotising and blinding us.

The band treats a fine line between pleasure and pain (did we mention that they were loud?), and merged the two in their final song. For a full 10 minutes, the band produced an ungodly noise that can best be described as what one would hear strapped to the belly of a landing aircraft. The din even had the coolest of New York City's beautiful people covering their ears.

After the sound subsided, there was a hushed "thank you" and MBV left the stage.

We wish we could tell you about Dinosaur Jr., but by that time we were sore, exhausted and figured we had done enough damage to our ears for one night. We're sure that they were very good, and probably quite loud.

Sadly, My Bloody Valentine will not be accompanying Dinosaur Jr. to the Vertex this Wednesday. Perhaps it is for the best — the combined noise of these two bands would probably be more than Hadley could take. But if you should get the chance to see My Bloody Valentine, we highly recommend the experience.

Just don't forget the earplugs.

Mr. Lupo is clear about his view of Memoirs

Nice special effects, too little drama — plus At Play in the Fields of the Lord

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Did you ever wonder how it would be if you were invisible? How it would look to chew gum, eat Chinese food, smoke, throw up? All these questions and more are answered in Memoirs of An Invisible Man, a ponderous film that leans too heavily on its special effects instead of delivering laughs or thrills.

Nick Hathaway (Chevy Chase) is a smart aleck stock analyst who becomes invisible due to a freak industrial accident. This much we know at the outset. Then, Nick tells us how and why through yet another framing device (enough of these, please!). He tells how, before the accident, he hit it off with a Smithsonian documentary producer played by Daryl Hannah.

And now he's not only invisble, but he's also being chased by a renegade CIA agent (Sam Neil), who wants to use him for secret missions. Memoirs then dissolves into a chase melodrama, complete with love interest in tow.

Director John Carpenter (Halloween) used to be one of Hollywood's most vibrant storytellers. But now he comes off like a kid in a toy store, showing off all of his neat special effects. Memoirs seems to exist just for that; to answer all the questions you could think of when one turns invisible.

The film excels in scenes that display the everyday problems with being invisible. The problem comes when Memoirs tries to intercut these clever interludes with a boring, stale chase adventure. Unfortunately, it drags the film to a stilted pace.

Chevy Chase carries the film with inspired ease, equally adept at physical comedy and one-liners. He seems to float through the movie, exuding the kind of charm that made him famous. He fails, however, in the clumsy voice-overs that appear when he's invisible and in the flashback narration. But once Chase is on screen, he more than redeems himself.

Daryl Hannah, on the other hand, is only a few steps away from my Melanie Griffith Award for Continual Blandness. It's hard enough to picture her without that fin she wore in Splash, much less swallowing her 'love' for Chase. I kept picturing the ultimate concept movie: "The Little Mermaid Meets the Invisble Man."

Everyone else seems to take a back seat to the effects, namely Sam Neil (Dead Calm), who tries, in vain, to make a character out of the absurd lines he's given.

Memoirs does contain some witty and obscure references as well as some humorous gags. Everything in the film is continually upstaged by the special effects. While breaking no new ground, the effects are interesting enough to forget what a clunker of a script they're in.

A chase film that never goes anywhere, Memoirs plods itself to an unsuspenseful finale and a sappy ending.

Memoirs of An Invisible Man is truly a mixed bag. Containing a great performance by Chevy Chase and some above-average special effects, it never lives up to the great adventure it promises.

Wait for it on video, where you can rewind the glorious gimmicks and watch them again and again. Grade: C+

RECENT RELEASE:

At Play In the Fields of the Lord: Aaaargh! One of the longest, most boring and most pretentiously annoying films in recent memory that has the distinction of having no point whatsoever.

Adapted from Peter Matthiessen's 1965 novel, the film tells (the long winded) tale of a mercenary pilot (Tom Berenger) who 'finds himself' among a tribe in the Amazon rain forest.

Along for the ride are missionaires Kathy Bates, Adian Quinn, John Lithgow and Daryl Hannah, who is once again playing "Serious Actress." The scenery is nice, but not enough to make it worth seeing. A proven cure for insomnia, this film is achingly bad. Grade: D-

With C and K, 'trust is key'

Imagine two men of like size working together as physical equals, using a give-and-take of weight to literally project their dance across the stage, and you've got the creative choreography of Creach and Koester.

The New York-based male dance company of Terry Creach and Stephen Koester will perform Thursday, March 5, at 8 p.m. in Hampden Theater, located in the Southwest Residential Area.

Although single-sex modern dance companies aren't new, all-male companies are rare. A "men's company" provides an opportunity to explore the physical aspects unique to men involving weight, strength, timing and shape. As the dancers' bodies quickly change velocity, force and direction, weight is emphasized or simply disappears.

Trust is the key to Creach and Koester's choreography, as dancers fly back into partners' arms, balance across their shoulders, and swing their bodies at a diagonal. What sounds like the thrills of an acrobatic act is performed with the delicacy and fluency of a ballet. Incorporating a free and easy style of movement into their work, Creach and Koester's dances are about timing, intimacy, and daring.

In a work entitled, "It Takes Two," the dancers portray the emotional depths of losing a loved one to illness. Without speaking a word, the relationship of man to care-giver is instantly made clear — one man's back is tense, the other man's arched in despair. With tender and defiant moves, the dance is performed to a mix of pop songs and utilizes benches to represent beds, barriers, and in the end, a single coffin.

These collaborations represent an athletic and emotional understanding which has developed over many years of work together. Creach and Koester perform throughout the United States, Canada and Europe. Based in New York, they've been produced by Dance Theater Workshop, Joyce Theater's 3D Festival, Danspace Project and others. They have been awarded Choreographer's Fellowships from the New York Foundation for the Arts and from the National Endowment for the Arts.

In addition, Creach and Koester will be in residency at the University from March 3-5 and will give a dance workshop on March 4 at Hampshire College. For ticket information call 545-2511.

Wild Boyz coming up short

By A.C. FOSTER
Collegian Staff

Remember the days of your early high school years when the radio stations were playing Bon Jovi's Slippery When Wet, and Poison's Look What The Cat Dragged In in constant rotation? Remember when all the girls would tease their hair when they wore one of those concert T-shirts? Remember when it seemed everyone lived and died to hear "Living On A Prayer?" Well it seems that the latest in teeny-bopper-headbanger glam rock music can be found on the debut album by the Wild Boyz, titled "Unleashed."

The Wild Boyz' music is about as original as their name. From start to finish, the album consists of the radio oriented and commercial hard rock that made early Poison popular. Their debut single, "I Don't Wanna Cry No More," has found its way onto rock radio stations such as WAAF, but is severely lacking in the quality department. The song, as well as many other instances on the album, sounds like a work performed by a high school band that has defined limitations on their abilities, both instrumentally and vocally. When lead singer Willie D. attempts to hit the high notes at the end of the song "Forever", he sounds like a cassette being played at high speed (the Alvin and the Chipmunks effect).

Willie D. and fellow band members Joey Wylde (bass), K. Lee Lauren (drums), Valentino (guitarist), and Matt Stevanz (guitarist) show signs of improving in songs such as "Roll The Dice," and "High Tonight," but just when it seems that you hear the music maturing to the hard rock standards that the Wild Boyz are apparently trying to associate themselves with, they do something to undo it all. One example is when they combine the lyrics "I'm gonna drink but I ain't gonna drive. . ." with "I've got places to go and people to do. . ." in the song "High Tonight," making the lyrics sound as if they were written in collaboration between MADD and Bill Clinton.

The group's back-up vocals are another exampie of an area where they fail short. They're all very monotone and monophonic sounding, giving them a very flat harmonization and producing too clean of a choral sound for rock and roll. The chorus of a song is perhaps the most important when determining its success, and, especially for groups who use a lot of backups, when it falls short the song lacks the "punch" that is an integral part of what makes successful hard rock groups what they are.

Furthermore, the Wild Boyz need to work on their creativity. They are often found sounding like re-created early Poison and Bon Jovi in subject matter. In fact, the song "Cowboy Ride" sounds like something directly out of Jon Bon Jovi's lyric book. The album does however show some signs of potential, and a good engineer (as the overall sound quality of the album sounds "cheap") and a significant producer could be just what they need. For this time around however, the Wild Boyz come up short of the mark.

The Wild Boyz will be at The Vertex Niteclub, Hadley, this Sunday, March 8. Doors open at 7:30 p.m. Tickets are $5 in advance, $7 at the door. The show is 18+.

Imagine the Indigo Girls adding the voice of Natalie Merchant of the 10,000 Maniacs. Now imagine them still unknown, playing small venues to crowds of half-interested, half-curious music lovers. Finally, imagine them as close as a PVTA bus.

This is the image that comes to me when I think of the band disappear fear playing at the Amherst College Campus Center Thursday night. The two Frank sisters will be doing an acoustic set and you'll think they are the Indigo Girls incognito.

Last semester disappear fear was a quartet, adding bass and drums to complement their wonderful voices. It will only get better. The show at Amherst College will be your opportunity to catch them this time in rare form.

Sonia is the musical wonder of the two, playing guitars, keys, harmonica, as well as singing and writing the songs. Cindy harmonizes with the brilliant voice range she has, adding to Sonia like sand to a beach.

This tour is completely acoustic, sans electronique. The intimacy of the setting will let them feel out the crowd easily, especially considering their tour is stocked with college venue dates.

The show is at the Amherst College Campus Center Frontroom, the big yellow building down the hill past the quad. The show is upstairs and will seat about 200 people.

Doors will open at 8:00 p.m. and the show will begin around 9:00 p.m. No tickets are sold in advance, simply bring $5. to the door. The show is sponsored by Campus Center Program Board.

Its heart's in the right place

The Christopher Columbus Follies
Bowker Auditorium
February 29

The Massachusetts based Underground Railway Theatre presented a special show this past weekend, intended to examine questions of race and cultural identity in America.

Their offering, The Christopher Columbus Follies, was a flashy production with too much politics, and too little point. A self proclaimed "eco-caberet," Follies sought to examine the legacy of Columbus, using various media — among them song, dance, comedy, and puppetry.

What made the show fall short of true cabaret was it's rather lofty goals. Though billed as an "irreverent romp," there was little that did not come off as heavy handed, as the five-person ensemble painted their picture of a Columbuslan paradise, buried beneath the detritus of Western culture.

Its heart may well have been in the right place, but Follies rarely played fair. It used it's "examination" of Columbus and "Explorer's Disease" as an excuse for railing against political foes, yet hid behind its format when asked for coherence. How is Columbus, or even colonialism in general, responsible for the sinking of the Titanic, or the increased methane emissions from cattle?

More disheartening still was the show's apparent hypocrisy. After soundly cursing our culture's excessive use of plastic products, the ensemble unveiled an enormous ten-foot puppet made of — what else? — plastic.

What The Christopher Columbus Follies boasted was many short pieces which were highly entertaining, in and of themselves. Among the highlights were the "Terra Sutra," an instructional book on deflowering a virgin continent; "Otro Mundo," a musical quartet about America's "discovery;" and a hilarious bar scene in which a drunken oil tanker captain explains ethics to Columbus ("If you 'discover' a great new restaurant, that doesn't mean you can kill all the waiters and put your name over the door").

Too much politics and lack of a clear message made The Christopher Columbus Follies fall short of it's goal. Sometimes the simple approach is the most powerful.

Locals: Blue Rain and Bark Like a Dog

By BRIAN HARRINGTON
Collegian Staff

This week we take a look at two really top-notch local bands worthy of some acclaim. They are relatively new to the scene but have been plugging at it for some time now and are poised to become quite popular around these parts in the coming year.

My buddy who works in local radio informs me that he can tell a lot about a band from their posters. If the flyer is eye-catching and cool then the band is probably good.

That axiom certainly can be applied to Blue Rain, who's gig posters tend to reflect an eye towards graphic design. Even their band logo is cool.

So much for aesthetics. How about the music?

Blue Rain focuses on the same aspects of originality and professionalism in their music and it is certainly evident in their recently recorded demo. The songs are clean and well crafted and there are noticeable influences of many diverse styles ranging from pop and punk to rockabilly and the blues. But as singer/guitarist Roland Lapierre responds when explaining their music "I don't like attaching labels. It's all rock n' roll to me."

Blue Rain was formed in March 1991 and started off playing the Wednesday open mike night at Sheehan's Cafe in Northampton. A short time later they were playing gigs in area rooms such as the Charlemont Inn and the Hadley Pub.

The group consists not only of Lapierre, but UMass graduate student Tris Carpenter on bass and vocals, Andy Vengrove on drums, and recent arrival James Robinson on guitar. The band writes all of their own material and includes only one or two covers in their repetoire.

JABBERWOCKY

They recorded their four song studio demo last November at Garden Gate Recordings in Greenfield on 16 track. The tape is high caliber and certainly worthy of local release. It has already received some airplay on WRSI's "Homegrown" show. The band performed live on the air on "Homegrown" last month.

Some choice cuts off the demo are "Neighborhood Bar Blues" and the pop tinged "Mixed-Up Kid". Lappiere handles all of the songwriting chores and his style reflects a knack for building on hooks and tight rhythms.

Blue Rain is back at Sheehan's Cafe this week, this time as a headliner instead of the open mike. The show is tonight and it's certainly worth checking out in Northampton.

Bark Like A Dog is another local band with the UMass graduate student thing. In fact all the members in this band are graduate students at the university.

Now here is local group that has worked hard in the past year to cultivate a following and develop their act. It must be paying off, because this weekend Bark Like a Dog celebrates the release of their debut album "Better Late Than Never."

This is a 10 song compilation that features all original tunes and it is available on both CD and cassette formats. The band plans to sell the album at shows and at local retail outlets such as Al-Burns and For the Record.

The band has established itself at the local live music watering holes such as the Seven-O's in Sunderland, the Hadley Pub and Twister Tavern. They've also cut their teeth playing benefits and parties.

Formed in October of 1990 Bark Like a Dog is a four man outfit that consists of Frank Rossitto on lead vocals, John Savage on bass guitar and vocals, Jeff Simpson on guitar and vocals, and Mike DeRosa on drums and percussion. The group has a "full sound" that exhibits a blues and rock influence.

A brief conversation with bassist John Savage reveals the group to be very down-to-earth yet self confident. "We have no political agenda or axe to grind" says Savage. "The performances are centered on the music."

The band operates on the philosophy that they do what they do for the sake of entertainment and fun. In other words, they work hard yet party hearty. There's no "big hair" in this roots rock band.

Interestingly enough the group has targeted songwriting as a priority for this coming year. While the new album features all new material the band still carries a strong repetoire of covers.

The album Better Late Than Never will be available when Bark Like a Dog" launches their "CD Release Weekend" this Friday and Saturday nights. Included as part of the festivities will be T-shirt and CD giveaways.

Look for Bark Like a Dog at the Hadley Pub tomorrow night and at Twisters Tavern the following evening.

BLAH, BLAH, BLAH... The Blue Flame, a burger joint in downtown Northampton, has been featuring live blues and jazz music on Wednesday nights... The Wednesday night bands at The Pub in Amherst have become so popular that the club is now thinking about booking live

Weld says Bush's prospects good in Mass.

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld predicted Wednesday President Bush would do well in Tuesday's Massachusetts presidential primary, but challenger Patrick Buchanan planned to campaign in the state over the weekend.

"I think he'll do better here than in New Hampshire, partially because he has a lot of ties here," Weld said of the president.

Weld mentioned Bush's birth in Massachusetts, the fact a sister lives in the state and the president's ties to Bay State Republicans such as Transportation Secretary Andrew Card, White House aide Ron Kaufman, Lt. Gov. Paul Celucci and himself.

"I would think this would be one of the president's better primary states," Weld said.

Weld however, declined to set a benchmark vote for Bush and Celucci reminded reporters that most of the money Buchanan spent on the New Hampshire primary was to buy ads in the Boston media market.

"So he has delivered a message through radio and television to a significant extent in this state. So this does make the race a little more competitive than it might be," Celucci said.

Buchanan ran strongly in last month's earliest-in-the-nation New Hampshire primary, but Bush held the political commentator to under 40 percent of the vote.

Meanwhile, the Buchanan campaign announced they would hold a rally Saturday on the steps of the Statehouse and Buchanan was expected to campaign himself in Massachusetts on Sunday.

"Buchanan's Middle American revolution is gaining ground in the South and Pat has a burgeoning army here in the North," said Buchanan's Massachusetts chairman Bill Barnstead.

Barnstead said the rally would include colonial bands leading a band of Buchanan volunteers to rout "King George's army from their throne of power and privilege."

Bush solidly defeated Bob Dole and other challengers in the 1988 Massachusetts presidential primary. Then Gov. Michael S. Dukakis carried the state for the Democratic Party in the November general election.

Weld predicted Bush would do well in Massachusetts in the General Election, but stopped short of predicting a victory for the president, citing the possibility that former Sen. Paul Tsongas could be the Democratic nominee.

council members. Addresses and sample letters will be available in the GEO office in the Student Union and from teaching assistants.

Underdown said last December GEO realized the impact going to a HECC meeting can have. Graduates gathered at the meeting to speak against a proposed elimination of stipend increases, and told the committee members what their actual material circumstances were like.

"The council members were truly surprised, and there was a high level of human reaction," said Underdown. "We just need to re-educate the state boards as to how students are really affected."

In the time leading up to the trip to Boston, graduate teaching assistants will be educating undergraduates via "teach-ins," giving their classes a factual history of tuition increases and how it affects state appropriations.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

WHY YOU SHOULD START PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT WITH YOUR EYES CLOSED.

For retirement to be the time of your life, you have to dream a little—about the things you've always wanted to do: travel, explore, start a business. Just imagine...

With a dream and a plan, you can make it happen. Your pension and Social Security should provide a good basic retirement income, but what about all those extras that make your dreams possible? You'll probably need some additional savings.

THE DREAM IS YOUR OWN. WE CAN HELP YOU WITH THE PLAN.

TIAA-CREF Supplemental Retirement Annuities (SRAs), tax-deferred annuities for people like you in education and research, are a good way to save for retirement and save on taxes now. SRAs are easy—you make contributions through your institution before your taxes are calculated, so you pay less tax now.

You pay no tax on your SRA contributions and earnings until you receive them as income. And saving regularly means your contributions and their earnings can add up quickly.

What else makes SRAs so special? A broad range of allocation choices, from the safety of TIAA to the investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity; no sales charges; a variety of ways to receive income, including annuities, payments over a fixed period, or cash. You may also be able to borrow against your SRA accumulation before you retire.*

All this, plus the top investment management that has helped make TIAA-CREF the largest retirement system in the country.

So start dreaming and planning for the time of your life. Because the sooner you start your SRA, the greater your savings and your retirement will be.

TIAA CREF Ensuring the future for those who shape it.

Women's track ends weekend a solid sixth

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

Last Saturday and Sunday at the New England Championships held at Boston University, the University of Massachusetts women's track team made a valient effort but placed sixth behind five very strong teams.

Before the two day meet, coach Julie LaFreniere added up the potential points if her squad performed its best and came up with 40. UMass' final score was an impressive 42.

However, a field led by national powers University of Connecticut, Boston University and Boston College were too much for the Minutewomen, who did manage to place ahead of the University of Rhode Island [seventh] which had been a nemesis in the past for them at the New Englands.

"I was really pleased with the outcome particularly because we finally beat URI," LaFreniere said. "It was a tough meet for us particularily because the five teams ahead of us (UConn, BU, BC, Northeastern and Providence) were pretty much untouchable.

"I wanted 40 points going in and came out with 42 so I can't really complain about our effort," she said.

Leading the way for UMass was tri-captain Lee Ann Ambrose who became New England champion in the 600 yard competition.

"Lee Ann performed great, as she has all year," LaFreniere said. "This weekend at the ECAC's, she'll have a good chance to place in the top three in the 600 and might even win it."

A new School record [one of three for UMass] was set by Kelly Lilgeblad in the 3000 meter event with a 950.25.

The second school record was an impressive 915 in the 4x800 meter relay.

"Going into these two events (4x800 and 4x200), we were ranked sixth and seventh respectively and ended up coming in second and third," LaFreniere said. "It was an outstanding performance by the girls - they really came to compete."

This weekend, UMass will compete at the ECAC Championships in Syracuse, NY which, according to coach LaFreniere, is always a tough meet.

"There are always some really excellent teams who compete at this meet so we're going to have to be at the top of our game and hopefully set some more school records," she said. "Sometimes teams go to this meet just to qualify people for Nationals and don't really care how they do.

University of Massachusetts point guard Anton Brown scored 17 of his 22 points in the second half, while hitting 7 of 10 shots from the field for the game. With UMass trailing 51-50 after a timeout at 14:36 of the second half, Brown sparked a 14-0 UMass run by hitting seven consecutive shots. Brown, who leads UMass with an average of 4.3 assists per game, dished out five last night. Brown was also 7-for-10 from the free throw line, while grabbing five rebounds.

Why UMass won

The Minutemen called a key timeout with 14:36 remaining in the second half after falling behind 51-50. After the timeout, UMass went on a 14-0 run and never looked back. The Minutemen displayed a spectacular full court running game as they beat the Rams down court on offense time after time which led to 43 UMass points off fast breaks. The Minutemen had five players in double figures for the second consecutive and ninth time this season. UMass shot 65 percent from the field in the second half (60 percent for the game) while holding URI to only 39 percent after the intermission (46 percent for the game). UMass also had one of its most successful games from the free throw line, hitting 32 of 40 (80 percent).

UMass closes regular season with 96-88 victory over URI

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts basketball team finished the regular season on Ash Wednesday with a bang, reducing a gutsy University of Rhode Island team to ashes with a 96-88 win.

With a backbreaking 14-0 second half run, and the solid play of Harper Williams (team high 22 points) and Anton Brown (20 points), UMass slipped past the Rams for their ninth straight win, despite a Herculean effort by Jeff Kent, who scored a game high 35 points.

Trailing 51-50 with 14:36 left in the game, the Minutemen, (25-4, 13-3 in the Atlantic 10) with their intensity flickering on and off all game, turned it on for good.

Williams drove inside and finger-rolled the ball, giving UMass the lead for good. He then assisted to Brown on a touch-pass spectacle which led to Brown's basket and foul shot, giving the team a 55-51 lead.

"I just felt that I had to do something to lift this team," Williams said. "I felt I didn't play well in the first half, I owed it to everybody to play well in the second half, and give it all I had."

Brown hit two straight jumpers, and Herndon slashed through the lane again for a bucket with 12:18 left. Freshman Jerome Malloy's (11 points off the bench) three free throws ended the 14-point run and gave the team a comfortable 64-51 lead with 11:44 remaining.

Rhode Island freshman guard Jason Alexander, coming off his A-10 Freshman of the Week award, paced URI with 15 points and shot 3 of 5 from three-point range, hitting two treys from NBA distance.

Alexander and Kent's treys allowed the Rams to close within 5 twice within the last two minutes, but both times the Minutemen hit both of their free throws. UMass' excellent free throw shooting (32-40) allowed for a more comfortable finish to the game, as they hit 11 of 14 from the charity stripe in the last three minutes.

The Minutemen, despite the unveiling of the Atlantic 10 Championship banner, came out flat in the first half and trailed until William Herndon slammed down an ally-oop from Brown that gave the Minutemen an 8-6 lead. Herndon's one-handed dunk was one of his more spectacular dunks this year.

But the team only showed flashes of intensity in the first half, and Kent and Andre Samuel couldn't be stopped. The tandem had 11 points in a row at one point in leading the Rams (19-8, 9-7 in the A-10) to a 19-15 lead with 10:30 left.

Herndon stepped up his play, however, cutting through the paint for 6 points in a three minute span, sparking UMass to wrestle the lead back at 8:21. UMass had a scant 43-38 lead at halftime. Jim McCoy (12 points) and Herndon had 24 of those, yet something was missing.

"We played similar to the first West Virginia game tonight," said UMass coach John Calipari. "But the difference was that no one stepped up in that game. Tonight, we had Jim and Will step up in the first half, and Anton and Harper in the

URI's Skinner proud of UMass

He didn't walk with a limp like he does now. In fact, back in the early 1970s when he dawned the maroon and white for UMass, he could really move and he could score — a lot.

It's strange for those who remember him as a player to watch him pace the sidelines for any team other than the Minutemen. But that is exactly what he does now as the coach of the University of Rhode Island.

Al Skinner will always be remembered as one of the greatest players ever to play at the University of Massachusetts. His name is inked at the top of many of the statistical categories that exist in the UMass media guide.

He is UMass' 11th all-time leading scorer, with 1,235 points. By the time Harper Williams and Tony Barbee graduate, he will drop to 13th, however, Skinner scored all his points in only three seasons, while the top six scorers played the full four.

Things weren't as complicated for Skinner back then as they are now. The FBI is currently investigating a possible campus-wide sports gambling network at Rhode Island, which has affected several members of his team.

"I'm extremely pleased with my club," Skinner said, after last night's 96-88 loss to UMass. "I think they're handling themselves extremely well. I think they're playing some pretty good basketball considering the conditions we have been under.

"I love the school," said Skinner, in his fourth year as head coach. "There is nothing wrong with the school. There are just some unfortunate circumstances, but those things happen. I'm sure they exist on most campuses."

Yesterday at the UMass sports luncheon, Skinner spoke about pride and how happy he was that his alma mater was doing so well. He said when he first made it to the NBA, players would talk about the schools they graduated from like UCLA and Indiana. They would talk about how great they were. And when they asked him about Massachusetts, he would have to mumble they weren't doing too well

"But now, it's like yeah, Massachusetts is in the Top 25," he said. "I'm extremely happy about the success that [UMass coach] John [Calipari] has had. I was disappointed when we were struggling. I always felt with the right person in charge, this place could be very successful. And obviously that has occurred."

As for his own club, Skinner and the Rams hope to be invited to the big dance and have a good shot with their 19-8 record and the A-10 tournament still to come.

Kerrey packs it up in presidential race

By JILL LAWRENCE
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — On paper, Bob Kerrey was perfect presidential material. But in person, he often fell short.

The Nebraska senator ended his Democratic candidacy Thursday with wit and warmth that he didn't always show on the campaign trail, and with bottom-line honesty that did come through — often to his detriment.

Kerrey's credentials were unsurpassed: Vietnam Medal of Honor, self-made millionaire businessman, former governor, slayer of two Republican incumbents in a conservative state, former boyfriend of actress Debra Winger.

But the magic that worked in Nebraska was missing in his first national campaign. Kerrey admitted as much at a wistful and sometimes emotional news conference as he abandoned the race.

"A campaign depends upon the ...candidate's capacity to communicate and to establish trust," Kerrey said, "and I did not begin to do that until very late in the campaign."

Kerrey won a big victory Feb. 25 in South Dakota, but never translated his assets into widespread appeal outside his own region. He consistently finished at or near the bottom of the pack.

Kerrey, whose campaign is about $1 million in debt, said money problems contributed to his decision. "We ran out of gas," he said.

There are four Democrats still in the field- Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton, former Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas, Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin and former California Gov. Jerry Brown.

On the campaign trail, Kerrey insisted that Clinton was unelectable because of questions about the Arkansas governor's use of a draft deferment to avoid serving in Vietnam. But Thursday Kerrey called his attacks "political hyperbole" and said he would campaign "feverishly" for Clinton if he is the nominee.

"The only unelectable politician running for president of the United States is George Bush," Kerrey said.

For weeks in New Hampshire, site of the critical first primary, Tsongas was perceived as a regional candidate and Clinton was beset by allegations about his personal life. But Kerrey was unable to attract voters searching for an alternative.

The first-term senator was an uneven campaigner who alternately impressed and bored audiences. He seemed to move weekly from one theme to another- trade,

IRS worried students cheat on gov't taxes

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — The government is worried university and college students may be cheating on their taxes.

The Internal Revenue Service is investigating whether students have been paying taxes on financial aid. Any portion of a scholarship applied to room and board or travel has been taxable since 1987, assuming the recipient already earns above a certain minimum.

"There is a concern that many taxpayers don't know the room and board portion of the scholarship is taxable income," said Gail Ellis, a spokeswoman for the IRS.

The agency last month collected information from Harvard University on scholarship recipients, officials there confirmed.

Students are indignant over the apparent crackdown.

"This is really frightening, to try to use the IRS to beat on students," said Selena Dong, legislative director of the U.S. Student Association. "Students are barely able to meet college costs and all of a sudden, there's new, tough IRS position on scholarships. It's incredibly frustrating."

Financial aid has been taxable since 1987, although the law does not require that a school report the sum directly to the IRS. Instead, students are expected to disclose it under "wages, salaries, and tips" on tax forms, Ellis said.

Financial aid applied to books, supplies and tuition remain tax-free, said Marianna Pierce, a Harvard attorney who acknowledged that the school turned over files on 3,500 scholarship recipients in early February.

The records, from the calender year 1989, include the students' names and social security numbers and the amount they took in from financial aid and paid out in tuition.

Students who are not claimed as dependents on their parents' tax return must themselves pay taxes if they earn above $5,500 from part-time or summer jobs or other sources, including financial aid applied to room and board or travel. Dependent students pay if they make $3,400 or more, as long as the money comes from taxable interest or dividends.

Bringing power to the people

Nader offers citizens 'electoral empowerment'

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Although Ralph Nader is a "non-candidate" in the 1992 Presidential race, the well-known consumer advocate and political activist says he is offering something better than any of the declared candidates — a platform that will return the American political system to its democratic roots.

Nader, who will be speaking on "Electoral Empowerment" Sunday night at 7 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium, is on the ballot for the March 10 the Massachusetts Presidential primary.

The basis of Nader's campaign for ending what he calls the "selfish oligarchy that has produced economic decline, the debasement of politics and the exclusion of citizens" from politics is found in an article he produced in February titled "The Concord Principles: An Agenda for a New Initiatory Democracy."

Nader says he believes the proposals he has put forward will put an end to the long-term process by which "the political system. . . has degenerated into a government of the power-brokers" while Presidential campaigns "have become narrow, shallow, redundant and frantic parades."

"People today are very receptive to the proposition of strengthening our democracy — this encourages them to band together," Nader said in a telephone interview with the Collegian yesterday.

Nader pointed to the large audiences he has spoken to in New Hampshire and Massachusetts as evidence of what he considers the widespread desire for change among the American electorate.

He said he hopes to create a "model for the future" by empowering citizens to build coalitions throughout the nation allowing them to regain control over the political process.

Nader has proposed a number of ways of "protecting voters from having their voting powers diluted," including a binding none-of-the-above option on the ballot, 12-year term limitations for members of Congress, public financing of elections through volunteer taxpayers checkoffs and easier voter registration rules.

Although there is widespread belief that term limitations may make legislators less likely to act toward long-term goals, Nader says he believes 12 years is more than enough time to serve.

"People in high-pressure jobs become stale after eight or 10 years — there needs to be a constant flow of fresh energy," Nader said.

Nader said the current system allows senior legislators to control congressional committees, keeping newer members "under their thumbs." Long-time legislators are more likely to be "preempted, bought, rented or co-opted" by special interests such as the auto industry, Nader said.

Nader also said term limitations would increase political activity on a local level by forcing more elections and "giving greater visibility to principles and counter-principles," which are necessary to stimulate political debate.

While Nader has presented the Concord Principles to all the other candidates and invited a written response, he said none have responded, and only California Democrats Jerry Brown and Larry Agran have even said anything positive about them in public.

"The candidates won't even take a stand on any of these issues," Nader said, noting that all of his reform proposals "don't cost the taxpayer a cent."

Nader said enactment of his program for initiatory democracy could help this country's international competitiveness by redirecting the use tax money used for the defense of Japan and Germany, who Nader said are "perfectly capable of defending themselves.

"Bringing that money home will help create jobs which aren't just paper-shuffling, but have a high multiplier effect in the economy," Nader said. "With the end of the Cold War, we have the cessation of the 'Red Menace' — the federal budget deficit is now the red menace we have to face."

Despite the country's deep recession, Nader said President Bush's apparent strength in his bid for re-election lies largely in the fact that the Democratic Party has produced "tweedle-dee, tweedle-dum candidates."

"Paul Tsongas has said he'll be the 'best friend Wall Street ever had,'" Nader said. "What he should be saying is 'I'm going to apply some law and order to Wall Street.'"

Man convicted of using occult to bilk woman

SALEM, Mass. (AP) — A North Andover man accused of using witchcraft to bilk an heiress of more than $500,000 was convicted today of larceny and perjury.

A jury deliberated more than five hours over two days before returning the verdicts this morning against Richard Leno, 46. Sentencing was set for March 19.

Leno was charged with one count of larceny and two counts of perjury for defrauding Susan Rogers Panagakos, 36, of her inheritence in the early 1980s.

"She is a simple, innocent person who was taken advantage of by a scheming, manipulating, controlling man," said David Schwartz, assistant Essex County district attorney.

"He took her trust and he took it to his advantage," he said.

Authorities accuse Leno of carrying out the crime with a series of bizarre deeds, including the branding of the woman's breast with his initial to show his dominance over her.

The heiress apparently had demonstrated interest in the occult, officials said.

In his closing argument defense attorney Robert P. Deveau said state's evidence was spotty and inconsistent.

Deveau cited a handwriting expert who testified that business cards, checks, receipts and a calender notation, verifying repayment of a loan from Penagakos to Leno, were authentic.

"It seems as though miraculously the prosecution was unable to obtain checks with information that could prove Mr. Leno's point," Deveau said.

There were no officials legal documents, Deveau said, because it was a loan between friends.

But Swartz disputed Leno's contention that he merely borrowed the money from Panagakos and has already paid her back.

"A fish doesn't get caught until it opens it's mouth ... and Mr. Leno has opened his mouth," Swartz said.

He then read Leno's testimony before a grand jury in 1987 in which Leno testified under oath that he had never used funds entrusted to him by Panagakos and had never had a joint account with her.

Evidence presented in court over the past week — bank statements, a car invoice and personal notes point to the contrary, he said.

Then, after a 1987 civil suit in Suffolk Superior Court that is still pending, Swarz claimed Leno forged and altered documents in order to make it look as though a North Andover house and a Rolls Royce bought with Panagakos' money were used by both of trhem and that the money was repaid.

Swartz added that all of the documents showing repayment of the loan are questionable. He also said Leno's explanation of how he paid $155,000 for the house without a mortgage is not consistent with the evidence. Leno said he inherited the money in hard cash from his father in 1979.

Leno was unable to pay until his utility bills from 1979 until 1981 when he first established a joint bank account with Panagakos, according to testimony.

A conviction would mean a possible prison sentence of up to 15 years for Leno.

Student aims to fund orphanage in India

By DAVID RIVERA
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts student has begun raising money to create an orphanage in India to care for ten young children.

Deep Krishnakumar, a junior civil engineering major, has begun a network of fundraising in hope of caring for parentless and homeless children thousands of miles away.

Krishnakumar, a native of India who has lived most of her life here in the United States, felt compelled to start the orphanage following a trip made to her homeland.

"I've been to India many times but the proper opportunity developed in January," she said.

The orphanage, which hopes to care for ten children between the ages of five and six years old, has been well received by a fundraising organization in the five-college area.

"I know the number of children we hope to help sounds small," she said, "but all of us involved feel it's a beginning."

Krishankumar also added that people should look at the creation of an orphanage as a program to help the children of the world.

If successful in India, she feels similar programs can be started throughout the world and even here in the United States.

"We have established a trust in India and we hope that in a few years the money we raised will make the orphanage self sustaining," she said.

Krishnakumar she hopes the program will house, feed and educate the ten children until the age of 16.

Krishakumar, along with her roomate Sonalee Patel, has gotten the UMass South Asian Club to sponsor the charity's first fundraising event — a dance to be held tonight starting at 8pm at the Blue Wall.

Letter is major issue in debate of state reps

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The three candidates in the race for the Third Hampshire District's state representative seat squared off in a debate highlighted by differing perceptions of a letter by Independent Larry Kelley to Gov. Weld urging one of Kelley's opponents to drop out of the race.

Republican Mark Enoch, Democrat Ellen Story and Independent Larry Kelley participated in a debate sponsored by UMass radio station WMUA.

While the candidates discussed last week's vote by the Board of Trustees to increase tuition by four percent, the deterioration of the University's library and their proposals for revitalizing the local economy, the focus of the debate soon shifted to a recent letter by Kelley to Gov. Weld.

Kelley, a self-proclaimed "republican-minded fiscally conservative Independent," wrote Weld that since Democrats outnumber Republicans 7-1 in the district, Enoch stands no chance of beating Story and will only take away votes from Kelley.

"I know this is an unusual request, but could you please get Mark Enoch out of my way," Kelley wrote to Weld. "[Enoch's] 300 vote total (if he's lucky) will simply spoil my chances of beating a typical tax-and-

Student leaders debate issues

Campus activism cited as key in candidates' forum

By MICHAEL R. LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

Although the proceedings began a half-hour late, a debate between candidates running for the positions of Student Government President and Student Trustee centered last night on the importance of student activism and access.

Jennifer Wood, the Commuter Area Government President running for Student Government President, issued her opening statement and answered questions while her running mate, current Student Trustee Kevin Newnan, sat waiting for the other candidates to arrive.

Jeffrey Markuns, Chair of the Residential Student Association and Wood's opponent for SGA President, said he couldn't attend the debate in the Cape Cod Lounge due to a Zoology exam.

His running mate, Christopher Moran, didn't arrive until 7:30 pm after attending a pep rally in the Cage for the men's basketball team.

Wood, a junior Japanese major, focused on the issues of student empowerment and access.

"I'm a proponent of activist government," she said. "Students can only be powerful if they're educated and organized."

Wood also stressed that the University must make a greater effort to open itself to minorities and the poor.

"We need to fight to maintain funding of services like the Office of Third World Affairs to insure participation of students of color and minorities in student government," Wood said. "We need to maintain the access of the University to students of the working class."

Newnan then echoed Wood's sentiment that the University must not be allowed to become an elitist institution.

"Essentially the mission of UMass was to provide quality, affordable, accessible public higher education for all working class citizens," said Newnan, a senior political science major. "We've lost sight of the accessibility factor in this institution."

Wood and Newnan both agreed that each candidate compensates for the other's weaknesses, and they look forward to working with one another if elected.

"My biggest weakness is my ability to play 'the insider game,' to cut deals with the administrators," said Wood. "I don't see that as really affecting my position because my running mate is really good at it and I think that's why we make a really good team."

Although Newnan said he is not an organizer or a mobilizer, he said these qualities can be listed among Wood's strengths.

Moran, a junior landscape architecture major who is the Sylvan area president, urged students on the Amherst campus to mobilize with other students at the 29 state colleges and universities to fight for student issues.

We need to be able to stop the screwing over of students which has taken place before," he said.

"But we're not the only people fighting this. We need to join together with the other public higher education colleges and work not only with ourselves, but with them as a group."

Moran repeated Wood's contention that student activism must be increased.

"Area governments are the grass roots of this campus," he said. "To get people involved, we have to start with the Senate."

Speaker sees women taking power

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

The former president of Smith College examined the long way women have come and the distance they still have to go as she spoke about women and leadership at Smith College Wednesday night.

The first women president of Smith, Jill Ker Conway spoke "About Women" to nearly 300 people as part of the fifth annual Kathleen Ridder Conference posing the question "Where's the next generation going to go?"

"How and why is it that the modern feminist movement is worried about women's active participation in competitive managerial positions? And why do men have so much difficulty thinking that women would actually take political power?" asked Conway.

Analyzing the late 60's movement, Conway noted the strategy leaders chose of using the courts to enforce equality but failed to act upon — "a strategy of people who expect justice to be confirmed, but don't bring it through in their own movement."

spend Democrat."

Kelley wrote that since he believes he can come within 100 votes of beating Story, "[Enoch's] withdrawal really is to the benefit of the Republican party. . . more so than getting slaughtered on March 17."

Enoch said he believed Kelley's predictions about the race are wrong and that Kelley has made a "mistake."

"This letter simply demonstrates Larry's political naivety — that is just not done, " Enoch said. "I am the elected nominee of the party and Weld couldn't make that kind of a call even if he wanted to.

"The race is between Ellen and me," Enoch said.

When questioned about the letter, Kelley said it was not negative campaigning but "a statement of fact — Mark doesn't stand a chance."

"Traditionally, Republicans don't do too well in Amherst," Kelley said. "Several weeks ago, I stood up at a debate and said Ellen Story was going to win the Democratic primary — I'm getting pretty good at being Nostradamus around here.

"If you want to talk about negative campaigning, talk about whisper campaigns that get circulated around," Kelley said, referring to a rumor that he has been receiving campaign contributions from Presidential candidate David Duke. Kelley vehemently denied the rumor.

Story beat Democratic runner-up Jon Hite by just over 100 votes in the Democratic primary on Feb. 18. Enoch was unopposed in the Republican primary.

The general election for the seat will be held on March 17. The seat was vacated last fall when three-term Rep. Stanley Rosenberg was elected to the state senate last September.

She considers there to be a large number of women with senatorial experience and sees a near future of more women entering political office.

"On the whole we have argued about the notion of the female role and the effort to influence rather than to take power," said Conway.

Suggesting that we have to go much further back to think about political roles of women, Conway saw the impossibility for nineteenth century women to imagine themselves in leadership positions as a major problem in the feminist movement.

"The modern feminist movement gives us back the image of physically vigorous women, women in military, running the same risks as males," said Conway.

Conceiving the likelihood of women's athletic performance exceeding that of males, Conway considered the rate that women are excelling. "It's clear that a female body can take in oxygen just as well as a male; the only thing women have been lacking is training."

"Female images of women are extremely powerful," Conway said, looking back twenty years when women were not allowed to run in marathons.

Discussing the women's army core and the reason women were involved in combat in the Gulf War flying over Kuwait, Conway said "they were the best flyers."

"It will be interesting to see where we end up," Conway concluded, asking "When are we going to be ready to take responsibilities of rule?

Evening news from hell

"Before we can leave our parents, they stuff our heads like the suitcases which they jam-pack with homemade underwear."

Maxine Hong Kingston: The Woman Warrior

Maxine: That's it from here. Reporting from my own apartment where my mother's just moved in, Maxine Kingston for The Family Station...Back to you Nick.

Nick Nyhan

Nick: Thank you, Maxine. In other family news tonight, Maxine's Aunt just flew in from China and was greeted by the whole family at the airport. According to one eyewitness, the first words out of Maxine's mother was: "You look so old and fat." Maxine will have a full report at eleven, including a live interview with the weird cousin that no one talks to. He has not spoken since the last holiday, and we're certainly looking forward to that. Susan?

Susan: Nick, tonight we will air the last of the three-part series: "Mothers and Sons." Tonight's segment: How to Turn Your Son into a Better Husband: For You and His Wife. (Roll Tape)

It seems that the Johnsons can't agree on anything, especially when it comes to their pride and joy, young Edward.

Edward is the only son in the Johnson family and boy-oh-boy, is he pissed about that.

"I was never asked if I wanted this family. No one ever approached me with a list of options. I was put here and I still can't get a straight story on how and why it happened. I know my parents have never had sex. I've hid in their closet and watched."

"Do you have video-tape of them not having sex?"

"Yes, I do but the networks have been avoiding me. The press is clearly 'in bed' with my parents on this one. Something is going on around here and the public ought to know the truth."

We went to Edward's mother, Dorothy, and asked about the tape and her son's concerns. She had this to say:

"Edward has a wonderful imagination and he loves his parents very much, especially his mother. He would never do anything to hurt us, especially me. I'm his mother, you know. We share an unspoken bond of love and trust and he should know that. I tell him all the time."

"What about his curiosity about his parent's sex life?"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Relations between you and your husband?"

"Well, I've asked Edward if he'd like to have me talk to him about baby-making because I think it's important that he know how his father made mistakes." (cut to Anchor desk)

Nick: I'm sorry to break-in here but I always wanted to tell my mother to shut-up. And we have a special report from Maxine who is standing by at the airport. Maxine?!

Maxine: Thank you, Nick. It seems that as my Aunt was waiting for her bags at the baggage carrosel, she saw what she thought to be another woman taking what looked to be her own bag. She then approached the woman and demanded to look inside the bag to see if her underwear was inside. My Aunt always packs her underwear on top, Nick, just in case she needs to make a quick change. I understand that we will get back to my family after a short break. So, back to you Nick.

Nick: Thank you, Maxine. Now, back to me.

'Cruise Ship Directors' air beef

We the "Cruise Ship Directors" and our crew would like to express our discontent with the SGA's recent activities. Not only do we object to the senate referring to House Council and Area Government officers as nothing more than "Cruise Ship Directors," we take offense at the fact that our elected student leaders find it "outside of their structure" to deal directly with the people who voted for them. It has come to our attention that the new constitution prevents House Council and Area Governments from participating fully within the current SGA system.

On Wednesday evening, the senate voted on a constitution that removes Area Governments' vote on all amendments. This causes a problem because the forty people who actually attend the senate meetings now solely represent all 18,000 undergraduates. The senate now claims that it "...may state official undergraduate opinion on all matters concerning the undergraduate community . . ." In other words, these same 40 people claim the power to express your opinions for you. This is arrogance taken to the extreme. How many students actually know who their senators are? How many of those senators are aware of the concerns and views of their constituents? House Council and Area Governments are in constant contact with the students they represent. These organizations represent student government at its most basic level. If student government is to run effectively, this level's voice can not simply be dismissed as insignificant. To do so is to ignore the voice of the students the SGA is supposed to represent.

Let's face the facts: the SGA has done very little thus far this year to improve student life on campus. The Area Governments and House Councils provide valuable services to students, ranging from advocacy to programming, and the students do appreciate this. This is not to denounce the roll the senate could and should play in campus issues, if they would only devote their time and energy to valuable student issues rather than political infighting and maneuvering for more power.

Once upon a time, the current SGA leaders actually advocated the rights of House Councils and Area Governments, where their careers in student government began. Now it seems that they've forgotten their roots as well as those they have pledged to represent. Trying to render these groups ineffective only harms the SGA itself by cutting out its power base. Instead, the SGA could make effective use of the House Councils and Area Governments as a resource to aid them in campus-wide issues and events.

No, the officers of House Councils and Area Governments are not simply "Cruise Ship Directors" as suggested by the senate. They are individuals who represent the interests of fellow students with whom they have close contact and communication. Perhaps power really does corrupt and it is the image of power that is blinding the SGA leaders to what is really important to the students. For the new constitution the body has approved is not in the students' best interest. We can only hope that the Area Governments and the students of this university will realize the folly of such a constitution and will tell the SGA that this is not the type of representation they desire, by voting no on approval for the new constitution.

Many thanks to you, our cynical brother

Kudos to Tony Westcott for his most delightfully hateful editorial in Monday's Collegian. It is very inspiring to know that elsewhere on campus there is someone as overwhelmingly cynical as us. Perhaps others will follow suit and choose pessimism as their favorite means of expression. As of late, there seems to be a trend of campus-wide mirth and benevolence. We hope that through articles like this and our own persuasive opinions that animosity can once again return to its proper place on this lovely campus.

Hetero paraphernalia victim of homosexism

Recently, a resident from my dorm approached me and asked my opinion regarding an incident that had befallen him. Apparently, a Resident Assistant, who is a representative of the university, informed him that he was displaying an "offensive" poster on his door and that he must take it down. The controversial poster in question depicts the Miller Beer Girl dressed in cowboy garb and showing little, if any, nudity.

Now, important to mention is that this student resides on the fourth floor of Brett Hall which has been termed "a social diversity floor" by the university. The interesting part of this scenario lies in the fact that if one were to stroll five feet down the hall, in either direction, that person would find him/herself bombarded with homosexual and lesbian paraphernalia or literature that could also be interpreted as "offensive."

After seeking advice, I was informed by a member of university officialdom that the fourth floor of Brett has its own ideological and dogmatic methodology of problem solving which is separate from the university. In essence, I was told that a certain circle of fourth floor residents came to the conclusion that this poster was offensive and that it must be taken down. For the sake of comparison, imagine for a moment that the tables are turned and those members who were once sitting in judgement are now being judged. I believe that they would become just as frustrated at the fact that someone was trying to mold their living environment. Now, I believe my argument to be quite simple. LIVE AND LET LIVE!!! The fourth floor is not a conformity floor — it is a diversity floor. The fact that this resident was told to take down his heterosexual paraphernalia goes above and beyond the policies of the university or even the state of Massachusetts; his constitutional liberties of freedom of expression were violated. I only hope that these individuals can, at some point, realize their own hypocrisy and strive to educate themselves, as well as others, about the evils of sexism, whether it be heterosexism or (if I may be at liberty to create a new term) homosexism.

Pat Buchanan receives the nod on Mediocre Tuesday

Mexico and nearly every country in Latin America was taken in the same manner the U.S. was. Through Imperialism. Did I hear someone call the kettle black? Anyways, unless you are an Inca or Aztec . . .

Next Tuesday is Mediocre Tuesday (Sorry, Super is reserved for Sunday) for presidential primaries. I say mediocre because that is what best describes the Democratic "hopelesses." What are they hopeful of? That the Jackass party will reclaim the Presidency sometime before the 21st century?

I'd like to run through some of the pathetic pretenders.

Let us start off with Bill Clinton. Obviously the man is an idiot. He's the only candidate with a good looking wife, and yet he's going off someplace else to get some.

Next, Bob Kerrey. He's one million dollars in debt, and he's withdrawing from the race, according to Associated Press.

Too bad. That means Tom Harkin may move up in his place. If Harkin has his way, we'll all be wearing red for the rest of our days. People who think Pat Buchanan is scary should think about Harkin's Communist ideals.

Michael Morrissey

Tom, don't you see that Communism failed? And look at Britain. We may be having economic difficulties, but England is worse off than we are. Socialism can't work. Wake up!

If you want to build America, Tom, I've got a construction project down in Abilene, Texas that you can start on.

Jerry Brown doesn't even deserve space in this column, but since he's already in space, give him a wrench and he can fix the Hubble Telescope. Better yet, he can take some pictures of the Great Wall of. .

Last and least, Paul Tsongas. I've got nothing against the guy. Personally, I'm rooting for him to win the nomination. I hope that he won't embarrass our sorry state in November, but he probably will. Still, he's got great stances on nuclear power and business, and he's the only candidate with any courage whatsoever, at least from the Democratic Party.

Anyways, getting back on track, I'm not voting for Mr. President in the primaries. Although I feel that Bush has performed great in foreign affairs, the moron consumers won't feel happy unless he does something domestically. Maybe, if they bought American, . . .

Yup, Pat Buchanan gets the nod on my Republican ballot. I agree with a few of his ideas, but I don't think he'd make quite as good a president as Bush. It's a protest vote.

What I don't understand is the pabulum-puking liberals who try to link Buchanan with the Nazi party. It's dirty politics, and it's uncalled for. Buchanan has never endorsed nor been a member of the Nazi party.

Yeah, I'm talking to you, Trudeau. Why are all of your characters invisible? Is it because you have no artistic talent, or because you're suffering from your own identity crisis? For God's sake, your wife's more famous than you are, and she's an ex-Today show host! Ouch!

I just don't understand the hypocrisy of the liberals who are so adamant in their doctrines that they practically advocate the overthrow of our government, yet an adamant Conservative who expresses his opinions is linked with Fascism or the Nazis, especially on this campus.

Man says Pats' Tippett drew gun after collision

WESTWOOD, Mass. (AP) — A Roslindale man says New England Patriots linebacker Andre Tippett pulled out a gun after the two were involved in a car accident, Westwood police reported Thursday.

Tippett confirmed to investigators that he was in a collision Wednesday night but denied showing a gun, said Westwood Police Lt. Robert Prevett.

The incident occurred around 10 p.m. at the Westwood-Dedham line.

Mario Arpino told police he was rear ended and the operator of the other vehicle, later identified as Tippett, took a gun from his waist band and held it in his hand, Prevett said.

Arpino told the police the gun was not pointed at him. But in an interview, Arpino added: "I was scared. Anybody in their right mind would be."

After a brief verbal exchange, Arpino got in his car and drove away. He recorded the license plate number of the other car, and it was traced to Tippett.

Prevett said an investigator had a brief telephone conversation with Tippett, and he "acknowledged he was involved in a minor motor vehicle accident."

But Prevett added: "He denies having possession of a gun."

No charges have been filed as authorities continue to investigate the case. Prevett said police expect to interview Tippett within a few days.

The Patriots had no immediate comment.

Last year, Tippett was charged with assault and battery after being accused of scuffling with a customer in a Weymouth tavern. That case is still pending, Norfolk County officials said.

A guide to the area bar and club scene

"Are we going uptown tonight?"

Your work for the week is finished. You're sick of sitting around your room watching re-runs of "It's a Living." It's your 21st birthday and it's finally time to break in your ID. You don't feel like studying.

It's time to go out.

Some make a quick jaunt down North Pleasant St. Others jump on the bus to Northampton, Hadley or the north or south of Amherst. Regardless of the destination or the reason, UMass students love to go out. So much so that many who ordinarily would be prohibited by law to enter such establishments risk confiscation or arrest by altering their IDs.

What makes these places such a draw? It's just a room with a bar, a jukebox and maybe a pool table, right?

If this is your impression of the typical night spot, you've left out the most important ingredient: people.

Draft beer and mixed drinks are a draw to be sure, but besides the lure of alcoholic beverages, the main reason UMass students go out is to see

The Pub provides good times, great food

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

The Pub is one of those odd places which although the building the resturant/bar resides in boasts of nothing special architectually, it is a landmark.

Upon arriving in at the University of Massachusetts a few years back I think I immediately knew were a few places were. Namely, Southwest, the Tower Library and for some reason the Pub. I am not sure if it was included in our orientation packets, but I knew where it was.

Then a few weeks later I actually entered the restaurant and I realized why The Pub had such a reputation.

The Pub, located at 15 East Pleasant Street in Amherst, has been building that reputation for the past 24 years. It has proved to be so successful as both a restaurant and a bar its ownership last year purchased the old Chequers Restaurant building, at 422 Amity Street, and opened Rafters Sports Bar in the late summer.

At meal time The Pub presents a fabulous menu, chock full of big servings at reasonable prices. Definitely a good mix for a college town, but as bar Manager Judi Milar asssured me, The Pub's clientele is not limited to just students.

"We get a wide mix of students from all Five Colleges, adults, people living in the area and students parents," Milar said. "The students generally get our burgers or sandwiches because there more affordable but when their parents are paying the dinners go over well."

Indeed most of The Pub menu goes over well with me. If your there for dinner do not skip the nachos, which are "Definately a big favorite," Milar admitted.

If your not into the taste of the old southwest, the clam chowder is above average as an appetizer. From there feel free to dig into the excellent burger selections, a tasty chicken sandwich or the many dinner choices, including a great steaks.

Of course dinner is only one half of The Pub experience. At 9:30 the kitchen closes, tables are cleared and the once quite restaurant turns into a good college bar.

"We start to pack them in after 9:30," Milar said. "The kitchen closes and the college kids start coming in for cocktails."

Although the alcohol readily flows until 1 a.m. The Pub offers more than just good prices ($1 Miller Genuine Draft bottles). Milar has created an entertainment plan for almost every night.

Special nights include open mike night every Tuesday night, Greek night every other Wednesday, live bands on the opposite Wednesdays and possibly Thursdays in the future and a Disc Jockey on Weekend nights.

"We have the best entertainment in town," Milar said. "We are trying to move back to more live music instead of just a DJ. Right now we are working on developing a blues night which we will have in the future but right now we are not sure what night it will be."

The Pub has also offered karaoke in the past and it should start up again in April, according to Milar.

Also for your entertainment purposes The Pub has a pool table and a games room.

Certainly, by the size of the line which forms outside of the Pub on most nights the patrons must be enjoying themselves. On weekend nights there is not a more popular place uptown.

"The best thing about the Pub is the versatility," Milar summed up. "We offer a lot of different things to a lot of different people."

Delano's, a good time for everyone

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Looking for a place to meet people, grab a great meal or just listen to some acoustical singing? Delano's may be the perfect place for you.

Delano's, located at 57 North Pleasant St. in Amherst, draws a big crowd nearly every night for both dinner and drinks.

"We get a good mix for the dinner crowd, from college students to Amherst residents," bar manager Jason Holland said. "After dinner a large crowd of UMass students usually role in for drinks. A lot of fraternity and sorority members come here."

The bar scene at Delano's is definitely dominated by Greeks who make up the majority of the crowd. Holland is not sure why or when this habit began.

"I think it just happened," he said of the large Greek contingency. "It goes in trends, but right now they like it here and we are not complaining."

Don't get the idea that if don't have some letters on your shirt you can not get in. Delano's has something for everyone including Settie and the Acoustical Wave on Sundays. For dinner Delano's provides good food at good prices.

Head chef Jim Wood said, "we sell a lot of burgers and sandwiches but our dinners go over well also because they are such a good deal, everything on the menu is under $6.95."

Delano's specialties, according to Wood, are the grilled basil chicken, the hamburgers and the lasagna.

I would personally recommend the the very tasteful lasagna, served with warm bread and salad. You won't leave the table hungry after making that selection.

As for the nightlife, Delano's has some good food specials during the week. Tuesday night is the free all-you-can-eat Taco bar after 9 p.m. and Wednesday it is Buffalo Wings you can eat your fill of for free.

Delano's also boasts of a good sized poolroom where no one bangs into you while you are shooting and some very competitive drink prices.

"We have a good atmosphere here, a good clientele and some very reasonable prices," said Holland.

their friends, or to meet new ones. For students off-campus, a bar or club on a weekend is often the only place they can see old friends from classes and dorm hallways past.

Walking into one of uptown's many watering holes on a Friday night, you will see so many people you won't notice the decor. Even if you're a regular, you'll probably know only a few of them. But don't worry. They don't know you either — that is, unless you swallow your pride and say "hello," or start dancing. That's yet another reason to go out: social opportunity. It's not just a bar: it's a roomful of people waiting to be met.

Back to the accepted bar stereotype for a minute: true enough, some establishments do indeed consist of a bar, a few chairs, a pool table and a jukebox. But leave your pre-concieved notions aside; it's not something out of Eugene O'Neill's The Iceman Cometh. Unpretentious doesn't equal hole-in-the-wall, as a visit to some places off Amherst's beaten path will prove.

Often these places are frequented by Amherst's permanent residents. Don't let that deter you; they're out for the same reasons you are. They often make good opponents for a game of pool, as well — while you're trying to beat "grandpa" to impress your pals, the person you're playing against wants to prove to his friends he can thrash these "young whippersnappers."

Or something like that.

But in a region where diversity is the rule instead of the norm, this is exactly what you'll find. Some establishments pride themselves on food, for instance. If you've ever gotten the "beer munchies," you know how clutch a big plate of nachos or Buffalo chicken wings, the official snack food of God, can be. Just remember the reason they serve you hot food is to sell cold beer — but chances are if you've read this far, you don't mind buying cold beer.

Other spots, particularly but not limited to Northampton, feature dancing, either with live bands or disc jockeys. Current taste being what it is, if it's a DJ you'll most likely hear a mix of dance songs mixed in with some of those cheezy 70s songs you heard on AM radio as a kid. Those are often the most fun, by the way.

No one aims a gun at your feet and says "dance," but even if you're hopelessly clumsy you'll find after a few drinks everyone else is, too. Even if you don't catch a buzz before hitting the floor, once the jam starts pumping you forget how terribly self-conscious you are and start having fun. No one's going to laugh at you, either, unless you're so drunk you shouldn't be out in the first place. Going overboard and getting sick is no fun.

What about Northampton, anyway? The prices are generally higher and the clientele closer to middle-age, with the exception of the occasional group of Smithies out for a good time, but Northampton has a lot to offer. If you've got a safe ride (like the free bus, for instance) and you're looking for a change of pace, a trip to NoHo is definitely worth the travel time.

Nightspots in Northampton often include live music. NoHo has an excellent reputation for up-and-coming bands, as well as some internationally prominent acts who like to return to one of the places where they became famous. Take a few risks and you may someday have the privilege of saying "I saw them when they were just starting out."

Well, what are you waiting for? Get your pals, designate a driver (don't let me catch you driving drunk) and have fun.

If you see Greg Sukiennik, remember he prefers darker beers and gin and tonics with lots of lime.

Gemze de Lappe given fond farewell

By LISA LA MADELINE
Collegian Staff

Gemze de Lappe, a world-reknowned dance instructor and performer, is given a grand farewell after 13 years of teaching at Smith college. The annual Five College Faculty Dance Concert consists of dances from every campus, pieces from a guest choreographer from the Richmond Ballet, a piece choreographed especially for Gemze, and a farewell performance by Gemze herself. Don't miss the privilege of seeing this piece of dance history.

The Five College area has been privileged to know Gemze de Lappe, one of the countries foremost authorities on the late Isadora Duncan, a pioneer of modern dance. Gemze reconstructs and restages Duncan's words and teaches the Duncan technique which is that of "personal expression."

Gemze, radiating energy and experience of her own, relayed the trials of Isadora's life. "Isadora witnessed the firing of peasants in Russia at the time of the revolution and lost her only two children in a tragic accident.

"Isadora loved children," Gemze replied in response to questions about the Duncan piece, "The Mother," which Gemze performs in the concert. "(The piece) may be read as a lament for her lost children" or as representative of her love for all children, Gemze offered. Set to the classical score by Scriabin, Gemze's expressive performance emanates both of these ideas with reaching and embracing gestures. She has a magnetic stage presence like that of the incredibly expressive Isadora.

"The Fury," also on the program, choreographed by Duncan in the early 1900's, displays her experiences in revolutionary Russia. The dramatic score from Von Gluck and the personal touches of Gemze's direction create a performance that, Gemze herself admits, is "fabulous." The stageful of dancers (rather than the usual company of three that Gemze had used for the piece) and mystical effects, add intense feelings of agony and rebellious action.

Duncan's vision of "America dancing with great strides, leaps and far flung arms" is fulfilled in today's modern dance and certainly by other contemporary pieces of the concert.

Kathy Jennings' colorful choreography, set to music by Paul Winter, welcomes the audience with an "Amanda Touch." UMass dancers and Jennings herself blend angular and flowing movement with spicy, graceful technique and intense energy.

Hampshire College is represented by Ed Groff's piece, "Solitary Companions," a piece which explores the contradictions set by the title. Balances are followed by falls of defeat, and supporting movement is followed by violent tosses.

Wendy Woodson and Peter Schmitz from Amherst College offer a contemporary idea in performing art. The work is a videotaped perfomance of Schmitz, in which he voices the original text and performs natural yet disturbing movement in a cell-like room. The video disturbs the audience with angry and disconcerted dialogue and an eerie musical score by Janna Goodwin.

Video is used along with live perfomance in Jim Coleman's and Terese Freeman's "After this Time Before." A screen in back of the dancers displays the same movement at different angles and at closer range. The partnered lifts and embraces comfort the audience after the sections of furious solo movement and intense music from Bach.

Stoner Winslett, artistic director of the Richmond Ballet and an alumni of Smith College, brings two "pas de deuxs" for the concert, as a gesture to Gemze. The first excerpt is from the ballet Giselle and the other is from Winslett's own Other Places from 1990.

Winslett revealed that Other Places, set to a score from Angon Dvorak, "has not much of a 'story' about it,"but rather evokes emotions. The chosen excerpt, "The fourth Movement," conjures romance, Winslett believes, in every element. Winslett promises that the two dancers, originally form the Soviet Union, will dazzle the audience.

The audience and Gemze de Lappe are given an extravagent farewell in the final piece, "Roses for Gemze," choreographed and performed by Five College faculty and set to music by Dello Joio. Proper dress, a crystal chandelier and a grand piano set the stage for the special occasion. Roses and emotions are shared and passed from dancer to dancer amidst light and frolicsome movement combined with comical dramatics.

The joyous yet highly emotional finale culminates an evening of heartfelt tidings for Gemze de Lappe.

The performance is being shown at Theater 14 / Smith College through March 7 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $5 general; $3 students / seniors / children.

Purely skankin' the Hatch with Bim Skala Bim

By ERIC POULIN
and DANA FORRAR
Collegian Staff

The second that you walked through the door Wednesday night at the Hatch, you knew that big-time fun was inevitable. Bim Skala Bim, the first band featured in the UPC Productions Best of Boston Series, was doing what they do best—making a roomful of folks jig, jump, shimmer, and dance their cares away to a nasty ska beat that's second to none.

"The best ska band in the world", as they've been called by many, took full control of the stage from the get-go, making it impossible for even the biggest wallflower to sit still. Although some folks weren't ready to kick on their dancing shoes right away, they found themselves with no choice, as Bim laid into their old favorites "Fathead" and "Wise Up" very early in the set.

If moshing's your scene, you would have been in heaven (or, at least the biggest frenzy since the last Mighty Mighty Bosstones show), because the way that bodies fly at a Bim show, some contact is inevitable. Purist skankers need not to worry, however, because there was plenty of room in the fringes for all dancers, guaranteeing a splendid time to be had for all.

Minibus opened to a somewhat meager crowd of non—hoopsters (Good God—there are some at this school!), and UPC crew. Once "Downtown" Anton Brown sparked the mighty Minutemen to victory number 25, folks began to trickle in, and they caught the end of a very tight Minibus set. If you had hooked a generator to the lead singer's feet, they probably would have produced enough energy to power a Southwest tower for an evening. The other band members followed his cue, and the few early birds present were treated to a surprisingly good warmup band.

But, the story of the night was undoubtedly Bim Skala Bim, as every song that they played, upbeat or down, seemed

NYC's best: Authority

By LISA J. CURTIS
Collegian Staff

It was immediately evident that this was a New York City band playing in Northampton. The Authority, a huge band — literally, opened for Shockra on Feb. 20 at Pearl St.

"That was a heck of a long time ago," you're muttering to yourself, but this band is carving a niche in the music scene.

The crowd for this particular show was clad in overalls, sandals and tie-dyed clothing. The band wore baseball caps, Skidz (you know the outrageously loud, draw-string pants that hang low on your waist), and sneakers.

The not-so-subtle theme seemed to be "the inner city kids out- on-parole meets the crunchy bunch."

The band's leader, Rennie Lopez on the timbales gives the music a wonderfully danceable, funky rhythm, in addition to his lead vocals. Unfortunately the guitars are loud, and his voice is often inaudible. Dave Masucci, on sax, Brian Sachs on drums, Tony Brito trumpeting, and Frank Ocaseos help to thunder the room.

Frank Cotto manages to look a bit like "Booger" in Revenge of the Nerds, yet plays the bass with skill and a bass player's unobstrusiveness.

Everyone in the band has this comedic approach to performing. Lead vocalist, Lopez, looks a little drugged when performing and makes goofy faces when he plays those timbales. He shows his teeth like Mr. Ed.

"The best" is when Masucci picks up his flute and sends the crowd into the band's theme song, "Officer Friendly." The band ominously chanting, "A-U-T-H-O-R-I-T-Y" was easily the highlight of the show. Surprising and different from their usual Latin beat, it shows off their ability to extract the best from what heavier rock music has to offer.

The band deals in societal ills with, "Cooties" a witty, but cautionary song of the AIDS epidemic. "Narrow-Minded People" and "Black House" talks about parents encouraging prejudiced attitudes in their children.

"We're trying to break down color barriers," says Lopez.

The Authority has opened for New School of Jazz alumni Blues Traveler and Spin Doctors.

to garner a favorable reaction from the Wednesday night crowd. People seemed most pleased when Bim kicked into any track from the How's It Goin'?, probably because those are the tunes that people are most familiar with. They played a solid repetoire of those songs ("Wise Up", "Paraguayan Sun", "In The Mail", "Blue", "Not In Anger", "Tell Me"), while sprinkling both new and older tunes.

The highlights of the evening for me were their two infamous classic rock covers—Pink Floyd's "Brain Damage", which closed the regular set, and Cream's old creaking dinosaur, "Sunshine of Your Love", which they played as an encore. The flexibility of ska enables old standby's like these to be revamped and revitalized, and a band like Bim are masters at the rebirth game. As opposed to the sampling, which is a more forced and generic method of making unconventional songs danceable, ska covers are certainly the more genuine way of doing it, as the musical integrity of the songs aren't lost through the new interpretations.

Vocalist Shanty Dan Vitale once again re-established himself Wednesday night as ska's premier vocalist of the day. His ability to shift from leading the bouncing pack in an happy manner, to bringing the whole place down by belting out a slow, heartfelt tune is very clutch, as he conjures up images of Joe Jackson meeting head-on with Ranking Roger. Coupled with trombonist and perpetual-motion machine Vito Incognito, they lead the band that's on the forefront of ska's grand return to the club scene.

U2's Achtung Baby to dominate the 90s

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

They are unlike most rock n' roll bands because they have consistently put forth a product of music that not only expouse's social conscious issues, but is also entertaining.

The only other band that could even put in the same category as U2, the most dominant band throughout the 1980s, is REM. I am sorry to disappoint all you Michael Stipe fans, but that comparison is not even close.

U2, the four gentleman from the tiny yet lyrically inspiring island off of the coast of Europe, (let us not forget the great poet Yeats was from Ireland), have put forth another quality product with the recent release of Achtung Baby.

The album seems to have an aspect that is not uncommon to the typical style U2 presents to it's listener. Most of the songs on the album deal with the aspects of confused love.

"Who's Going To Ride Your Wild Horses," "One," "Until The End of the World," and "Tryin' To Throw Your Arms Around the World" are just four songs that are great examples of their confused love message.

But the music that surrounds the outstanding lyrics, although not very politically inspiring, has a gripping feature that would make a great compliment for an Oliver Stone or Martin Scorcese film soundtrack.

The album does not get much playing time out here in the Happy Valley, but it is slowly making its way past Worcester from Boston.

The first two songs released form the album, "The Fly, and "Mysterious Ways" are slowly fading away but there are eight more quality songs that are gaining prominence and getting air time. Last week, "One, and "Until the End of the World," two songs mentioned previously, were listed on WBCN's top 10 songs played during the week of Feb. 23.

My favorite song and the most intense is "Ultra Violet (Light My Way)." Bono begins the song by talking as wailing instruments can be heard in the background.

The listener is set up so that when Bono stops and holds the last note, a instrumental jam takes place. The best way to compare the jam is to think of a cold glass of lemonade on a warm summer day.

The other songs on the album worth noting are "Acrobat," "So Cruel," and "Love Is Blindness."

Two songs that are not worthy of attention are the first two on the album. "Zoo Station, and "Even Better Than the Real Thing," are both bland and boring.

U2 will be touring the area late next week. They will be at the Hartford Civic Center on the 12, Worcester Centrum on the 13, and Boston Garden on Saint Patrick's Day.

Tsongas says he's no Santa

Economic plan has more style than substance

By ROB WELLS
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Paul Tsongas' economic program is a quintessential pro-business, pro-growth plan, much like doctrines held throughout corporate America. His appeal to voters appears to be grounded not in the plan itself but in his sober, no-nonsense, "I'm not Santa Claus" style.

Voters, economists and business leaders say they find the urgency of his economic message compelling and aren't concerned with the fine print.

"It's a campaign posture more significant in its themes than its proposals," said Thomas E. Mann, director of government studies at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think tank. He said the plan was, "not terribly austere."

"There's a certain sobriety in the manner in which he talks about the problems," Mann said. "But it's only in contrast to the other candidates who are calling for a middle calss tax cut that he seems austere."

Tsongas breaks the traditional Democratic mold by advocating business growth and shunning promises of quick economic turnaround. His standard stump speech line: "I'm not Santa Claus."

Setting his sights on long-term, he scoffs at the economic debate in Washington as political "happy talk."

"Until we, as a nation, address our economy firmly, effectively and honestly, America will remain in economic free-fall," Tsongas wrote in a January update to his 86-page booklet, "A Call to Economic Arms."

"We will continue to see talented men and women unable to find jobs, our standard of living erode, our products unable to find a world economy, our national power and influence decline."

The former Massachusetts senator proposes to strengthen the nation's manufacturing backbone through long-term capital gains tax cut, increased federal spending and private investment for research and development.

He advocates free trade, reform of the public schools by rewarding teachers and students for excellence and scrapping some antitrust laws to enable large corporations to compete with Japanese and German rivals.

He proposes an increase in gasoline taxes of 5 cents a year for 10 years with the revenue to pay for conservation and mass transit projects.

Polls suggest the message appeals to the educated, middle class voters — even a few Republicans.

"I don't think I've ever been as intrigued with a Democrat before," said RoseMarie Phillips, a Bedford, N.H., real estate agent.

"He came across as being really tuned in to the fact that the economy in New England and that across America is suffering," said Phillips, a Bush supporter and life-long Republican. "I think he's the only candidate that's come out with a real strong economic message that is believable."

In Denver, Peter Betsch voted for Tsongas in Tueday's primary. "I like his strong forward approach and his realistic economic ideas," said the 24-year-old representative for the Blue Cross-Blue Shield insurer.

St. Patrick's parade puts ban on gays

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination will investigate whether St. Patrick's Day Parade organizers violated state law by denying a gay pride group a permit to march, the commissioner said Thursday.

Michael Duffy, an openly gay Republican who heads the MCAD, said he would conduct and investigation based on a complaint filed by Patrick Ward, a member of the Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Pride Committee of Boston.

"I think sufficient facts will probably be gathered by Monday to make a determination whether injunctive relief should be sought or not," Duffy said.

The state's sexual discrimination law makes it illegal to "discriminate against any person of any sexual orientation in the full enjoyment of accommodations, advantages, facilities and priviledges offered to the general public by such places of public accomodation.

The South Boston Allied War Veterans Council voted this weeked to ban a gay group for marching, saying the council could not guarantee public safety.

"Often times those kinds of reasons are used as pretexts for the real reason, which is discrimination," Duffy said.

Mayor Raymond Flynn tried to mediate an agreement Wednesday night between the veterans group and the Irish-American organization.

Some gay rights advocates expressed disappointment with Flynn, who enjoys strong political support from both sides of the parade controversy.

Flynn spokesman Eric Simon said the Mayor's plans to be in Ireland St. Patrick's Day with Cardinal Bernard Law "pre-dated the great controversy" of whether gays could march in the South Boston parade.

Flynn won't be in Boston on Friday, either. Simon said the Mayor and his top aides would be at a retreat in Marlboro.

Veterans council member John Hurley, parade grand marshal Thomas Lyons and Councilor James Kelly of South Boston have suggested that the gay group wants to disrupt the parade and is only seeking publicity.

Other groups, including an anti-school busing group and the anti-abortion group Mass. Citizens for Life, have been barred from the St. Patrick's Day Parade before. The anti-abortion group was allowed to march in the mid-1980s

Duffy said that despite the MCAD's enormous backlog of discrimination cases, the agency would forgo standard procedure for the parade case.

"Given the time frame, a subpoena and the process that would be involved ... is probably not feasible, so there will be an abbreviated investigation to gather the facts as best we can given the short time frame," he said.

Duffy, who along with Ward belongs to a gay Republican group called the Log Cabin Club, said his sexual orientation would not cause a conflict of interest.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Good fortune smiles on you because of your generous nature. Rejoice! Old debts or favors are repaid. Be careful not to alienate a potential ally.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Family members look to your for leadership. Be firm but fair. An age gap only makes a romantic relationship more interesting. Accept a last-minute invitation tonight.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Drawing attention to your own achievements is not the way to win support at work. Instead, point out your co-workers' contributions. Higher-ups applaud your generosity.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Studying certain accounts may help you find hidden financial assets. Confidential chats lead to swifter career advancement. Learn from an older person's experiences.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Look out for your health by taking steps to reduce everyday tension. Developing better rapport with your loved ones could add years to your life! The financial picture will brighten late this month.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Do not let a lack of funds stifle romance! Eat at home and rent a video. A telephone call brings welcome news from the folks at home. Examine your beliefs and values.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Happiness is assured on the home front today. A family reunion adds to your sense of well-being. Be cautious if someone wants to rekindle a romance. You deserve much more than empty promises.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A day when loose lips can sink ships in the business world. Remain true to your ideals. Do not repeat office gossip. Keep your head down and duck the spotlight for a while.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A clash of wills could tarnish someone's image. Emphasizing teamwork puts a star by your name. Listen to your closest friends when it comes to romance. Go slow.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You may be feeling frustrated or nervous. Be careful not to let it show! Teamwork will succeed where a solo effort would fail. Make sure to spend time this weekend on romance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Hidden resentments could surface at home. Lie low until you see which way the wind is blowing. Do not drift away from your post. By tonight, you know where you stand.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Guard against stormy scenes at work. Someone who sounds furious is just letting of steam. Once the dust settles, you can get plenty of work done.

No. 7 ST. JOSEPH'S — 13-14 overall, 6-10 in the A-10

You always have to be wary of Temple and St. Joseph's because they have the home state advantage.

Injuries have plagued the Hawks this season, especially Rap Curry, who had such a fine freshman year. He was out early with a knee injury and is back now. However he is still not 100 percent.

Sophomore Bernard Blunt is averaging 21 points per game and Craig Amos is adding just over 16. If Curry was truly healthy, this team could be a contender.

Last season the Hawks upset the No. 1 seed (Rutgers) before losing to GW in OT.

No. 8 RUTGERS — 14-13 overall, 6-10 in the A-10

Only two teams in the country have beaten 6th ranked UNLV and Rutgers is one of them.

Steve Worthy can carry a team to victory and that alone should worry opposing coaches. Add a good game from Donnell Lumpkin and Daryl Smith and Rutgers can definitely beat you.

No. 9 ST. BONAVENTURE — 9-18 overall, 3-13 in the A-10

The fact the Bonnies have won three games in the conference is a minor-miracle to begin with. Do they have enough to get by Rutgers in the opening round? Probably not. But even if they do, they will face a UMass team which crushed them both at home and on the road.

TOURNAMENT NOTES:

All UMass games can be heard on WMUA (91.1 FM) with Joe Donovan and Brett Morris and on WHMP (99.3 FM) with George Miller and Howard Davis.

The quarterfinals and semifinals can be seen on SportsChannel and the final game can be seen on ESPN.

TICKETS FOR THE FINALS — IF THEY ARE TO BE PLAYED AT UMASS — If the Minutemen advance to the finals, tickets will go on sale at 8:30 a.m. Tuesday morning at the Curry Hicks Cage (No earlier, no matter how many people are outside waiting). The Cage will not open early. You must have a valid student ID, and you will be allowed to purchase two tickets, at $5 apiece. There will be reserved seats for the finals.

BUS INFORMATION — There are buses going to this weekend's tournament in Philadelphia. For details contact the ticket office at 545-0810. The package includes round trip motorcoach transportation, Sunday night in a hotel, tournament tickets for Sunday and Monday's games.

The bus leaves at 8 a.m. Sunday from Lot E at Alumni Stadium. It returns after UMass game on Monday if UMass wins Sunday or to be announced if UMass loses Sunday.

1991-92 UMass versus Rutgers / St. Bonaventure

Rutgers (first game) — The Minutemen rebounded from their loss at Temple to beat Rutgers at the Cage, 77-66. The Minutemen outhustled the Scarlet Knights the entire contest and led by as many as 23, four minutes into the second half. Harper Williams led the Minutemen with 17 points and seven rebounds. Donnell Lumpkin led the Scarlet Knight with 19 points.

Rutgers (second game) — The Minutemen halted their 29-year losing streak at Rutgers, 81-67, which put them into a first-place tie atop the A-10. The Minutemen did a good job rotating their bench as Jerome Malloy had a key 11 points. Rutgers' leading scorer Steve Worthy had 23 points. Harper Williams led UMass with 15.

St. Bonaventure (first game) — The Minutemen outclassed the Bonnies in New York, 76-58. UMass' Jim McCoy led all scorers with 21 points. Tony Barbee and Will Herndon grabbed seven rebounds apiece. Harry Moore scored 17 for the Bonnies and added seven rebounds.

St. Bonaventure (second game) — "It's all over" was the chant before this mismatch as the host Minutemen whipped the Bonnies, 104-67. The Minutemen took a 52-25 lead into the lockeroom at halftime and played their reserves in the second half. Tony Barbee had 18 for UMass, Harry Moore led the Bonnies with 18.

UM men's gymnastics earns 8th win of year

By KIM ADDESA
Collegian Staff

After setting a school record last week by scoring 266.80 points against an extremely talented team from Syracuse University, Roy Johnson, head coach of the University of Massachusetts mens gymnastics team was concerned his team might suffer a mental breakdown, and struggle to beat a weaker, less talented Southern Connecticut team.

"The kids are tired," he said before Tuesday's home meet. "I don't think we can take [Southern Connecticut] lightly."

To combat a mental breakdown Johnson made some changes in the lineup, allowing some of the gymnasts to get a rest. And although the Minutemen were frustrated by underscoring throughout the meet, they were able to soundly beat Southern Connecticut by a score of 256.45 to 234.65.

Steve Christensen had yet another strong performance, performing a new, extremely difficult routine on the pommel horse, and scoring a 9.10.

"I think that Steve's routine on pommel is one of the most difficult ever performed in this gym," Johnson said. "He actually deserved to score two or three tenths higher."

Adam Gould, competing in Christensen's all-around spot, finished in first place with a score of 49.90. He was followed in second place by Joe Haran who scored 49.50.

By winning on Tuesday, the Minutemen (8-3 overall) clinched third place in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League, with a record of 5-2.

Temple University and Syracuse University will battle it out this weekend for first and second place league finishes. The E.I.G.L. championship meet will be March 27-29.

However, the gymnasts from UMass must first concentrate on this weekend's meet, the New England Championships, which they are hosting Sunday.

The meet will give Southern Connecticut a second chance to beat the Minutemen, and UMass an opportunity to see where they stand as a team before the E.I.G.L. Championships.

In addition to UMass and Southern Connecticut, the University of Vermont, Springfield College, and Massachusetts Institute of Technology will all be competing.

UMass has previously beaten each of the four teams this season, and if any team has a shot of beating them on Sunday, and capturing the title, it is most likely Springfield.

The competition is scheduled to start at 1 p.m. in Boyden Gymnasium.

Next up for Minutemen: A-10 tourney

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Last year, the University of Massachusetts basketball team exited the Atlantic 10 tournament in the first round, losing a get-up-and-hit-your-roommate-to-relieve-the-frustration-type game to George Washington, 84-83, in overtime.

With the Colonials leading 77-76, UMass' Rafer Giles hit one of two free throws with three seconds left to send the game into the extra session. There would be three more ties in OT before the Colonials finally won.

While that loss ended any hopes the Minutemen may have had of playing in the NCAA tournament, this season, the A-10 tourney is a warmup to the Big Show which begins March 19.

Contrary to what ESPN and Dan Patrick might think, the Minutemen do not have to win the A-10 tourney in order to get an at large bid to the NCAAs.

"It's nice to be able to sit here and say we're in the NCAA tournament," said UMass coach John Calipari, after his team won its 25th game Wednesday night against Rhode Island, 96-88.

After dropping two straight conference games to start the season, the Minutemen (25-4, 13-3) have won 13 of their last 14 games in the A-10 and are the top seed in this weekend's nine-team field in Philadelphia, Pa.

"We're going to be the hunted," Calipari said.

The winner of the Rutgers-St. Bonaventure game, to be played Saturday at 2 p.m. in Temple's McGonigle Hall, has the unenviable task of playing the Minutemen Sunday at 9 p.m., in the Palestra.

Here is a brief look at the other eight teams vying for the A-10's automatic bid to the NCAA tournament.

No. 2 TEMPLE — 16-11 overall, 11-5 in the A-10

The Owls are maybe the only team in the conference which gets any type of respect. Can you imagine what they would be ranked if they had UMass' record?

Temple started slowly, splitting its first 16 games. But then it hosted the Minutemen in January, won and have rolled along to an 8-3 mark since.

The Owls have the toughest schedule of any A-10 team, which should help them in the post season. Three of their losses have come to teams which are currently ranked in the Top 25, including UMass, Kansas and Arizona. They also lost to Wake Forest, a team which had been ranked in the Top 25 earlier this season.

The key for the Owls will be how some of the younger players such as Eddie Jones and Aaron McKie perform. Don't forget, this was a school which advanced to the Final 8 of last season's NCAA tournament. Guys like Mik Kilgore and Mark Strickland have been there before and know how to win.

No. 3 WEST VIRGINIA — 18-10 overall, 10-6 in the A-10

What is wrong with West Virginia?

Just two weeks ago, the Mountaineers looked unbeatable, sitting atop the A-10 with a home game against UMass separating them from the regular season title. However, the Mountaineers have lost four of their last five games including the game with UMass and lost at Duquesne to end the regular season.

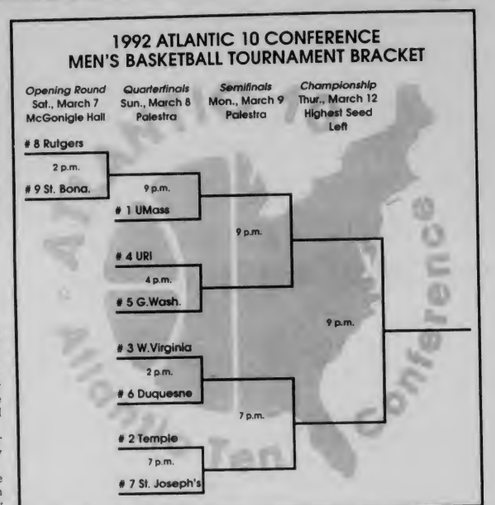
If the Mountaineers play up to their potential, they can beat anyone as they have already proven.

Ricky Robinson and Pervires Greene cause matchup problems for the opposition and Chris Leonard and Marsalis Basey are a more than capable backcourt. Look for Tracy Shelton to play a big role in this team's post season success.

No. 4 RHODE ISLAND — 19-8 overall, 9-7 in the A-10

With everything that is going on at the Kingston campus, concerning the FBI gambling investigation, winning the tournament may be too much to ask of this team.

However, only the Minutemen won more games than the Rams and if Jeff Kent plays the way he played at UMass Wednesday night (35 points) and Jason Alexander continues to direct the club the way he has, the Rams should beat George Washington. . . and then anything can happen.



No. 5 GEORGE WASHINGTON — 16-11 overall, 8-8 in the A-10

You've got to like Dirkk Surles and Sonni Holland. And Bill Brigham has filled in nicely for Mike Jarvis' club. At home, this club is tough to beat (9-3), on the road, it can be had (4-7) and at neutral sights it is 3-1 (only UMass' 6-0 is better).

Jarvis is a master in post season, as he has been in the NCAA tourney with Boston University. The question surrounding Jarvis now is how long will he stay in Washington?

Jarvis is one of seven coaches being considered for the head coaching job at Wisconsin. Yes, John Calipari is on that list too.

No. 6 DUQUESNE — 13-14 overall, 6-10 in the A-10

This is the last time the Dukes will play in the A-10 tournament, as they are leaving for the Midwestern Collegiate Conference.

The Dukes are coming off a big win over West Virginia, 71-64. Alan Watkins has been playing well and James Hargrove is the conference's top scorer (21.9 points per game).

A-10 tourney notebook . . .

- UMass' five starters in past Atlantic 10 tournaments: Jim McCoy (5 games) 24.4 points, 4 rebounds; Tony Barbee (4 games) 13.3 pts., 5.8 rebs.; Anton Brown (4 games) 6.8 pts., 3.0 assists; Harper Williams (4 games) 6.5 pts., 4.8 rebs.; Will Herndon (3 games) 10 pts., 4.3 rebs.
- Jim McCoy's point totals in five A-10 tourney games: 1989 vs. St. Joseph's, 35; 1990 vs. Temple, 11, Penn State 25, West Virginia 25; 1991 vs. George Washington, 26.
- The Minutemen have never won the Atlantic 10 tournament and haven't advanced past the first round in six of the last seven years.
- The Minutemen have been competing in the A-10 tournament since 1983, its first year of formation, and have a 4-9 record overall.
- Last year, the Minutemen fell in the first round in a nailbiter to George Washington, 84-83, in overtime. After trading eight second half ties, Rafer Giles' one of two free throws with two seconds left put the game into the extra session. But, after three more ties in overtime, George Washington's Dirkk Surles provided the winning points on a layup at 1:40.
- Following the 1989-90 season, the Minutemen had their best appearance A-10 tournament appearance ever, losing to Temple in the championship game, 53-51. To get to the finals, the 17-14 Minutemen upset 16-12 West Virginia, 78-55, and 25-9 Penn State in the semifinals, 64-59.
- If the Minutemen, who have won nine-straight games, win the tournament, they will eclipse the UMass record of 11-straight wins set by the 1975-76 club.
- UMass coach John Calipari's A-10 tournament record is 2-3.
- The A-10 tournament's first three rounds have been at the Palestra in Philadelphia, Pa. for the last three years, including this one.
- The Minutemen are shooting for their third tournament title this season. They already won the Great Alaska Shootout and the Abdow's Hall of Fame Classic.

Nader urges voter revolt

Consumer advocate asks for revival of democracy

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

The American people need to find a way to register a vote of no-confidence to candidates in the 1992 Presidential race and members of the mainstream political structure to return the United States to its democratic roots, according to famed consumer activist Ralph Nader.

Although Nader, who spoke before a packed house in Bowker Auditorium last night, is not a declared candidate in the Presidential race, he is on the March 10 Massachusetts ballot to support a reform agenda he put forth early last month in New Hampshire.

The crux of Nader's agenda for reform is found in the Concord Principles: An Agenda for a new Initiatory Democracy, released in early February, prior to the New Hampshire primary.

Ralph Nader

Nader pointed to what he called the five "power tools" of voting, a binding none-of-the-above option on the ballot, a 12-year term limit for legislators, easier voter registration rules and voluntary public financing of elections to allow citizens to "register a vote of no-confidence to politics as usual."

"Unless we keep the heat on, with the quantifiable results of registering a vote of no-confidence and affirming the new power tools, [politicians] will take your vote for granted," Nader said. "Once a politician has your vote, they will never look back."

Nader said his goal is to help build "civic roots" in the states where he promotes his reform agenda, noting that almost no political campaigns leave anything substantive behind after state primaries. He said a permanent citizen's action committee has been established in New Hampshire as a result of his efforts.

"Presidential candidates manage to go six months throughout America during a campaign without managing to pick anything up from the American people," Nader said. "Candidates simply deliver narrow, brutish, shallow and frenetic campaign messages."

Nader criticized the Reagan and Bush administrations for promoting an ideology of "corporate welfare" and using taxpayer's money to help promote the interests of corporations and special interests.

"[The government] promotes and ideology that says if you're a big business and corrupt enough to head toward bankruptcy, go to Washington," Nader said. "All the corporate welfare we have today does is reduce the incentive among corporate heads to work — what we need is 'workfare' for corporations."

Nader criticized Democratic candidate Paul Tsongas, who he called "Mr. Republican," for his support of the 1982 bank deregulation bill which Nader said he believed

Tsongas tops other Dems. in Mass. race

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts voters favor Sen. Paul Tsongas by a large margin over his Democratic rivals on the eve of Tuesday's presidential primary, a poll shows.

Sixty-four percent of likely Democratic primary voters said they would vote for Tsongas, a Boston Globe WBZ-TV poll found. Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton trailed with 8 percent, followed by former California Gov. Jerry Brown with 6 percent.

The poll found that Tsongas, who left the U.S. Senate in 1984, is extremely popular with both registered Democrats and unenrolled voters, who may vote in either party's primary. Even Republicans gave the self-described pro-business liberal high marks.

"He is as popular as any politician I've seen in Massachusetts," said Gerry Chervinsky of KRC Communications Research , which conducted the poll.

But even Tsongas supporters question whether he is electable in November.

When Democratic primary voters were asked, regardless of whom they personally support, to choose which Democratic candidate "has the best chance to win in November," Tsongas slipped to 38 percent and Clinton rose to 26 percent.

A quarter of Tsongas' own voters said Clinton would be the most electable in the fall.

"While Massachusetts supports its hometown candidate, voters here still have a question as to whether Tsongas can win in enough places outside the region to become president," Chervinsky said.

Student body inactive in presidential primary

By JOSH REYNOLDS
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts, voting in an area with strong Democratic tendencies, have yet to organize behind any one candidate. Although Super Tuesday is tomorrow, only a small group of Buchanan supporters have been visible on the UMass campus.

Neil Carpenter, interim president of the University Democrats, said that the lack of student activity on campus reflected the lack of attention candidates have shown Massachusetts.

"Everyone's blowing off the state," said Carpenter. "They've written it off to Tsongas."

"Typically, what happens on campus is an outgrowth of what is going on in the state," said Gerome Mileur, professor of political science.

"Supporters just don't happen, they have to be cultivated, that hasn't happened this year," he said. "The same thing happened in Iowa. Harkin was expected to win it with a walk, and he did."

Usually this campus provides, "a motherload of workers for the New Hampshire campaign," Mileur said.

Despite a similar lack of attention paid to the Massachusetts primary in 1988, the Dukakis campaign worked very heavily with students and within the political science department to get people to help out in New Hampshire.

This year, the University Democrats were only able to muster "about 12 people" to get on the bus and go hold signs in New Hampshire, said Carpenter. "We can't get that 'critical mass' needed to generate a sense of dedication or enthusiasm."

"I think the primary will be a dull, boring day, with low turnout, and I don't think the scene will change until the general election," said Mileur.

"This isn't anything unusual," said Michael Morgan, associate communications professor. "Eighteen- to 30-year-olds are less politically active than any other age group," said Morgan. "They don't see the connection between their lives and the national political scene. They don't feel that they have much impact."

"They're more worried about what their boyfriend or girlfriend said, and how they did on a test yesterday," said Morgan. "The biggest turn-out I remember for any campus demonstration was perhaps 1,000 people, over a change in the alcohol policy for the dorms," he continued.

Morgan cited the Democratic primary for state representative as a prime example of student political inactivity. "Of about 6,000 eligible student voters, I think less than 200 turned out. That says something." Compared with others in their age group, Morgan said, "I suspect that students are somewhat more active, but I don't have any research on that."

Lack of participation in such potentially powerful group in an election in which they have so much stake is "astonishing," Morgan said.

Though the under-30 crowd does tend to be less politically active, that's not the only problem this year, said Mileur, "It's not apathy to do nothing when there's nothing going on. The campus reflects the feeling of the greater community."

Women remember struggles, victories

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

International Women's Day, a day to celebrate women's accomplishments all over the globe in the past and to share their hopes for the future, remembers the day of protest when poor women working in New York City's garment industry went on strike against squalid working conditions on March 8, 1909.

The day was named by the Socialist Party to honor working women, according to professor Joyce Berkman of the University of Massachusetts history department.

President of the Progressive Organization for Women's Rights Gina Gombar told the Collegian last year that International Women's Day is a time for women to come together and "celebrate different experiences and cultures."

Berkman was involved in the struggle to establish a women's studies department at UMass and taught its first women's history course during the mid-1970s.

The first few courses focused on American and British women, and were part of a new "reclamation of history that involved more than the suffrage movement."

"There was a skepticism of the legitimacy of women's history by a minority of professors within the department who thought it was a passing fad," she said in an interview with the Collegian.

But Berkman also said the marginalization of women's history has largely dissipated in the history department here.

What can a student, particularly a women, discover from studying women's history?

For Berkman, it was the discovery "that the categories of history and generalizations of history. . . are wrong. The basic categories had to be re-evaluated based on what we learned from women's history." She cited the Colleges put lid on tuition rises

BOSTON (AP) — With the economy in a recession and enrollments dropping, private colleges and universities are keeping a lid on tuition increases.

After a decade of raising tuition in some years by 10 percent or more, private institutions have been announcing increases ranging from 2 to 6 percent.

"Everyone's trying to moderate," said Harvard University President Neil L. Rudenstine. "The question is, how far down can you go, and how long can you sustain it?"

Bennington College in Vermont, one of the most expensive liberal arts colleges in the nation, increased prices 2.9 percent this fall, from $23,200 to $23,800 — the lowest increase in the college's history, the Boston Sunday Globe reported.

Wellesley College increased annual charges 4.4 percent, to $22,900. Boston University hiked its price 2.8 percent, to $22,910. In both cases, the increases were the lowest in two decades.

In the 1980s, parents were led to believe that the best education was the most expensive, and colleges pushed prices up as long as there were enough students to fill classrooms, observers said.

But now, with a smaller applicant pool, it's a buyers' market, and many institutions are feeling squeezed financially.

Tuition hikes began to level off last year. And may colleges vow to continue to raise tuition within just a few point of the rate of inflation, about 3.75 percent.

But as worried as they are about finances, observers say colleges are even more worried about a backlash from the public that might be prompted by a hefty tuition hike.

"We have had lots of questioning going on at all levels, and tuition has been one of the most obvious and easiest things to attack," said Clare Cotton, president of the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities of Massachusetts.

Story grabs community support

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Democratic candidate Ellen Story received endorsements Saturday from a number of local and statewide groups, as well as two past state representatives from the Amherst-Pelham district who have gained higher positions in state politics.

Story, running against Republican Mark Enoch and Independent Larry J. Kelley for the Third Hampshire District's state representative seat, announced the endorsements of U.S. Rep. John Olver and state Sen. Stanley Rosenberg at her headquarters across from the Amherst Town Common.

Story also announced the endorsements of area state representatives Carmen Buell, Shannon P. O'Brien, William P. Nagle, Jr. and House Majority Whip Joan Menard.

"It's time to continue the tradition of representing this district from myself to Jim Collins to Stan Rosenberg," Olver said. "Ellen has a caring for human services and for the University which has been so deeply hurt."

Olver, who represents the Commonwealth's First District in the U.S. House of Representatives, noted that Amherst and Pelham have been without a state representative since early last October, when three-term representative Rosenberg was elected to the state senate.

"I'm looking forward to having Ellen join us [in the legislature]," Rosenberg said. "I'm carrying a much heavier load than I ought to be [as the only state legislator from the area]."

Story was also endorsed at the press conference by the Political Action Committee of Mass Choice, the University Staff Association, a union which represents 1,200 clerical and technical employees at the University, and the Massachusetts Gay and Lesbian Political Caucus, which has just under 300 members in Amherst and Pelham.

"Rosenberg and Olver have set standards of service in the House that have served the people of this state and this district wonderfully well," Story said. "They've set an example for me."

"It's been a long campaign and it's not over yet," Story said. "But I'm confident that we will win."

Competition for the seat began in earnest last December, as Democrats Jon Hite and Terry Franklin of Amherst and Pelham's Norman Page and Story began a long series of debates and campaigning.

Story beat Hite by just over 100 votes in the Democratic primary on Feb. 18 with approximately 1,600 votes. Enoch ran unopposed in the Republican primary.

Story, who is on leave for her job of 18 years at the Western Massachusetts Family Planning Council, received strong praise for her commitment to freedom of reproductive in a statement by Joyce Cunha, associate director of Mass Choice PAC.

South Africa's future 'uncertain'

U of Pittsburgh professor says bloodshed possible

By JOE O'CONNER
Collegian Staff

To predict turbulent South Africa's future is too much of a risk, as it could be a long, bloody phase, according to a native South African and University of Pittsburgh professor.

Dennis Brutus, a professor of Black Community Education at the University of Pittsburgh, said he has been a freedom-fighter against apartheid, even when he was exiled to the United States, for 25 years. He spoke at the New Africa House Thursday night.

"The reason for the instability in South Africa now," he said, "is because of the [future] sharing or transfer of power."

Brutus then outlined a new government being negotiated between the African National Congress and President F.W. de Klerk, the leader of the South African government. The ANC suggested "One person equals one vote.", as well as two legislative houses, like our system.

The apartheid government agreed to the plan, but only to equal voting in the first house. "The second house of the new government would have its representatives voted in by 'blocks', broken down by ethnic subdivisions." Brutus said. Furthermore, any one block would have a veto power "that would effectively paralyze legislation."

He said the ANC and the present apartheid government must find a middle ground. The name for the convention at which these two groups meet is called The Convention for a Democratic South Africa. He said it has met twice and is scheduled to do so again at the end of March.

"Last month, the apartheid government lost a local election in the small town of Potchefstroom," Brutus said. "De Klerk responded by saying he needs a new national mandate for the apartheid government to be represented at the next CODESA meeting."

The date for the vote on the mandate is March 17.

Also, Brutus said de Klerk has promised to keep the secret police and the military in the hands of the apartheid regime, "when these two items have been a primary source of contention in the past."

He described an article in the Wall Street Journal, which reported the U.S. Import/Export Bank and the International Monetary Fund have opened relations with South Africa.

"This shows that previous pressure on South Africa to end apartheid is gone," Brutus explained.

Brutus said he felt de Klerk would receive permission to have the government represented at the next CODESA meeting, as he threatened to resign otherwise.

"It would be civil war if that occurred," Brutus said, since the ultra-conservative faction would take de Klerk's place, and impose even worse conditions on the nation's people.

Cape Verdean alumni return to remember

By EVELYN A. DE JESUS
Collegian Staff

About 30 Cape Verdean alumni from the University of Massachusetts, and 50 present UMass students and staff from the Cape Verdean Student Alliance gathered at the Cape Verdean Alumni Dinner Saturday at the Bluewall.

They discussed the purpose of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance, which they said is to promote and mantain Cape Verdean culture at UMass and in the Five College Area. Also, they came to recruit graduating students and to give book scholarships to Cape Verdean students.

The opening remarks were made by Ricardo Townes, associate dean of Academic Support Services. He offered some of the background and history of the Cape Verdean community at UMass in the 80s.

Townes also praised the Cape Verdean community saying the community was distinguished on campus because of its "common leadership" and organization.

"They have regular attendance to the meetings, their programs are the most organized and they do very well in school," Townes said. "They have to be proud of the work that they do. They are certainly the most organized group on campus."

Paul Barrows, associate dean of Graduate Studies of University of Wisconsin at Madison was the guest speaker. Barrows explained "what it means to be a Cape Verdean and the responsabilities we share."

He also spoke of his college years at UMass, early in the 70s when there were a lot of activist movements on campus such as fundraising for the African National Congress and registration trips to Mississippi.

"Despite our community differences, we came together and supported each other," Barrows said.

Barrows remembered the struggles students faced during Cape Verde's pro-independence movement and fight to abolish "Portuguese colonialism" in the 70s. He said people who supported the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde were pressured and harassed by the rest of the community.

We were called everything, we were called "traitors," "communists," that caused tension," he said.

He continued to say "we went from being Portuguese, to Cape Verdeans, we have our own president and we have our own country. We come to America and we are not treated as Portuguese. Aristides Pereira, president of the island symbolized the same thing [to Cape Verde] as George Washington to the U.S. when it became independent."

Television's commercial tendencies said harmful

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Commercial American television distorts the way women, children and minorities are viewed because it fixates on trying to create programs that will sell products, said a University of Massachusetts communications professor yesterday.

"Television is ruled by a free market which rips T.V. for profit without public interest in mind," said Professor Justin Lewis who co-authored a book on audience attitudes toward the Bill Cosby Show.

Lewis said males are portrayed as active and aggressive, while females are seen as passive and nurturing. On television, males are shown three times more than women are which suggests men are more important, Lewis said.

"The more T.V. a person watches the more it reinforces the sexual imbalances and sexual attitudes in society," said Lewis.

American television has the most violent programs with 50 percent of their programs containing violence, said Lewis. "Television makes it seem like violence isn't bad and that it is actually a good way to solve problems."

Michael Morgan, a UMass professor of communication, said violence appears five to six times an hour on prime time television and 25 times per hour on children's programs. "Violence is a cheap and conventional way to sell programs to other countries because less dubbing is required," said Morgan.

Lewis said, even though African-Americans are no longer stereotyped on television this is not a step forward. "Now Americans believe there are no problems with inequalities and there is no need for affirmative action because everyone is equal," he said.

Morgan said, "After 20 years of much change in society, television has managed to remain culturally restrained from these changes."

White middle-class men are seen as the powerful and strong while minorities are portrayed as vulnerable, unequal to White men and are often the victims in acts of violence, said Morgan.

To combat these problems with television, the public must be educated as to the way the industry is organized and alternative ways of funding must be developed, said Morgan.

Lewis said the government should accept some responsibility for television because it is an important part of the public's life. "The government should make T.V. more diverse and less pandering, but at the same time not censor programs," said Lewis.

UMass escapes virus

Michelangelo computer threat fizzles

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

The threat of a renegade computer virus wiping out 500,000 computer hard disks across the country last Friday apparently fizzled out.

Named after the Italian Renaissance artist, Michelangelo, a powerful computer virus which was supposed to destroy thousands of computers on Friday, came and went with hardly a peep on the highly computerized University of Massachusetts campus.

"I don't know of anyone who found the Michelangelo virus on campus," said Charles Lyman, associate director of computer maintenance and sales at the University. Friday was the 517th anniversary of the birth of the master painter.

"I think it wasn't nearly as pervasive as people thought. It was not a bad situation," Lyman said.

Although a huge amount of press attention about the virus encouraged many users to scan for the virus, Lyman said he knew of only two students whose hard drives were wiped clean by the stealthy virus.

A virus like Michelangelo is a self-replicating code which spreads through infected floppy disks and is designed by computer hackers to trash the hard disk of a computer.

Art Gaylord, director of University Research Computer Facilities, said the inordinate amount of press attention the virus received spurred users to take precautions.

"It got an awful lot of press but it woke a lot of people up," Gaylord said. He was not aware of any terminals in computer science which were injured by the computer killer.

Scott Rogala, a sophomore undecided major and a user of the University's computer network, said many messages on the network anticipated the virus and encouraged users to reset the computer's internal clock and scan for the virus using special software.

"But if you have any clue of what you're doing, you're going to find [the virus]," Rogala said.

Lyman said computers today are more vulnerable than in the past since they talk to each other through extensive networks via modems — an easy way to infect one another.

Some computer specialists say there are about 1,000 computer viruses currently circulating and new viruses are being designed at the rate of two per day.

Why do people design such programs?

"It is something people do just to do it," Lyman said. And according to Gaylord, some create the viruses "for the challenge of it."

The number of viruses created each year has skyrocketed in the last few years, according to the Computer Security Association.

While in 1986, there were only three viruses unleashed on the populace, 1,026 were designed in 1991.

led largely to the Saving and Loan Crisis. The crisis is expected to cost the American public an estimated $1.3 trillion dollars.

Nader said these are examples of the way in which American politics has gone contrary to Thomas Jefferson's statement that "the function of representative government is to counteract that excesses of the monied interests."

Nader said it is necessary to deliver a "civic curriculum" to foster an understanding of democracy and democratic values among young people. He said the current educational system consists largely of "memorization, regurgitation and vegetation."

"No matter issue what your concern is, unless we develop democratic values in our schools, we will not have the levers to put reforms into place," Nader said. "The way to fulfillment of human beings is not in being a bystander, but in taking their civic time in welding the best society they can envision."

common historical myth that the 19th century saw a steady improvement in medical care of Americans.

Students of women's history discovered that female and infant mortality stayed the same during the century — and that women who were healers and midwives were "systematically purged. All this had been erased and obscured. . . ignoring women's lives."

What role does this study of women serve for historians?

Berkman explained that "one central contribution of women's history is the role of problematizing gender. The discipline added to the underscoring of the historical context in which people gain selfhood [as well as] the construction of difference which is historically created."

For Berkman, a course in women's history does not simply tell you what other women did. One can gain ". . .a sense of possibility. By having your past denied to you, you suffer from a form of amnesia."

"But the daily struggle of women to resist second class status — to deal with exploitation and marginalization — is an extraordinary record."

She noted in particular the struggles of African-American and Native American women as "an inspiring record of human possibilities for women and men. We don't know the human depths of resilience and creativity."

Through the study of women, both famous and anonymous, Berkman said we can learn "the dynamics of power, and how these power relationships are gendered, providing us with a framework in our daily lives."

She asks, where is there another course in which men are going to study "how they as men define things?" Berkman points out, "men are also victimized by patriarchal assumptions and rigid definitions of masculinity."

At the University, students are fortunate to have a sizable number of faculty members with concentrations in women's history.

These range from Yvonne Haddad and Mary Wilson (Middle Eastern women's history) to Joye Bowman (African woman's history) to Kathy Peisse (American women's history).

However, Berkman also notes that there are noticeable gaps in areas of women's history at UMass, such as Asian women or Latin American women.

Joyce Berkman's words convey both her passion for her field and the sincerity of her belief in women's potential. For her, history is not just a topic, but a challenge.

He's obnoxious, but I love him

Let me just say that if I were 21 years old, the first thing I'd do would be to buy Michael Morrissey a beer.

It's not that I agree with his somewhat ignorant ideas concerning the Mexican border; I don't. However, I do love what he's doing — he's writing editorials that evoke some sort of response from people. Sure, his opinions can't be taken seriously by most rational, thinking humans, but my guess is that Morrissey knows this, and I think it's kind of funny. I mean, at least he's not writing about dumb topics such as 'Why boxer shorts are sexier than briefs' or 'How much I love my Grandma' (yes, Collegian columnists have written on these topics.)

As I've already said, perhaps Morrissey's opinions are pretty ignorant and offensive, but at least he's attempting to touch upon a controversial topic, even if he doesn't go about it in an effective way.

America needs a change

A presidential election will be held this November. During this crucial time, every American citizen must examine the status of our country. What are our values? Where is our money being spent? What is our position internationally with respect to trade and politics? Once we complete our assessment of the nation, we must then decide what the major concerns will be over the next several years. Is our environment dying? Are we losing to the Japanese in industry? Are homeless people going to remain homeless? Will we continue to excessively fund the defense program?

Bob Silverstein

It is the duty of each presidential candidate to address these issues and to propose realistic measures to achieve our nations goals. Instead, the central issue surrounding the campaigns thus far has been "electability." It is sad that electability can be a driving force in the election process. This is a reflection of a nation which bases its decisions on whim, ethnic preference or other superficial issues. It is saddening that a candidate like Paul Tsongas may fare poorly because he's a Greek from Boston. Tsongas is telling Americans that we can get back on our feet but it isn't going to be easy and everybody is going to have to give up something. America is a country obsessed with "plenty". Whenever times are tight, and we are asked to pay a little more, each of us cries, "Why me? Why not tax the other guy?" The wealthy complain that too much is spent on Welfare, and the poor say that we should tax the rich. We consistently blame others as we continue to proceed down a path which benefits no one.

The Democratic party presently faces its biggest chance since 1976, when Jimmy Carter was elected. The country is ripe for change. What the party needs, however, is unity and a no-frills candidate. While Harkin, Kerrey and Clinton seem to be concerned primarily about "being elected", Tsongas and Brown may be the two with a real message. It is a foregone fact that Jerry Brown's message is far too left for our country to receive, but it is the fact that he is running for America's future, not for a presidential nomination that makes his candidacy noteworthy.

The problem with the Democratic party right now is that too many candidates hanging on too long will damage the credibility of the party. If the candidates continue negative campaigning we will be left with no clear forerunner when the convention arrives. It is obvious that each candidate will do well in their own region, but which one will do well in their own region, but which one has the solution to our nation's folly?

The Republican party, with its 12 years of power, has become a hard habit to break. It seems that the American voting philosophy has been, "when in doubt, stay with the known evil." Republicans win partly because many of the voters most likely to oppose them aren't even registered.

I must admit that even I was pleased with President Bush during the Gulf War. But as time has passed, I have come to realize that Bush has no other bargaining point in his bid for re-election. When Bush said, "READ MY LIPS — NO NEW TAXES" in 1988, America dismissed his previous "wimp" image and believed that he would stand tough against congress. With that statement falsified, and the nation spiralling downward in recession, there really is no statement Bush can make about his previous four years other than, "Remember the Gulf War."

Pat Buchanan may ironically play a pivotal role in this election. Although non-threatening as a final candidate, Buchanan presents a constant negative image of Bush and also offers a protest choice for anti-Bush republicans. Bush, currently far behind in campaigning, may be forced to devote a substantial effort into discrediting Buchanan's remarks.

The only issue which is crystal clear in 1992 is that America is in dire need of change. Unlike Reagan's campaign in 1984, which asked, "Are you better off than you were four years ago?", Bush may be obliged to ask, "Can you survive another four years?" The non-incumbent candidates in this election are all proposing change. The question is which one is offering the most realistic and well-rounded plan, and unfortunately. . . who is electable. The March 3 and 10 "Super Tuesday" primaries will give several major states, including Massachusetts, an opportunity to voice our requests for new leadership and will hopefully focus the efforts of the Democratic party toward a victory in November.

Bob Silverstein is a UMass student.

Racism rages in the Cage, across the entire University

Saturday nights at the [Curry Hicks] Cage usually provide the college basketball fan with an exciting escape from the rest of the University. I usually leave Curry Hicks having screamed for the players, having laughed at the officials and generally in good spirits after witnessing yet another debacle perpetrated by the UMass Minutemen. However, on Saturday, Feb. 22, I left the cage in a rage, having endured yet another racist experience on this campus.

For all of you not present, and for those who did not notice, there was a Black referee working the game that night. While this is not such a profound development, the comment of a nearby fan was deeply disturbing. Following a terrible call by the Black official, this fan leaned forward and deviously suggested to his friend that we, the fans, should "lynch that nigger."

Being a Jew on campus has opened me up to a wide variety of anti-Semitism, yet simultaneously I have enjoyed the benefit of countless racist comments towards African-American students. As a white student, many racists feel that it is acceptable for them to share their hatred for Black Americans with me, especially since other White students rarely correct this misguided notion by confronting racists. While I normally would have educated this bigot, I did not feel that the Cage was the proper place to explain the finer points of race relations to this redneck who outweighed me by a good 50 pounds. Hence the appearance of this article.

The irony of this entire situation lay in the fact that this racist was calling the official a "nigger", as well as offering to lynch the man, while cheering on, for the most part, an all Black basketball team. This is not atypical of racism, as bigots often feel that there are "good negros" (the basketball players) and then there are the "bad niggers", meaning all those Blacks doing something that doesn't agree with the redneck.

Steven Sparling

A recent survey revealed that over 60 percent of Jews on campus had experienced some sort of anti-Semitism at UMass. More alarming was the fact that many of these Jews felt that non-Jews would not aid them in the event of an anti-Semitic act. This fear of loneliness was reflected in studies of other minority campus groups and demonstrates a failure on the part of the campus communities to support each other.

It is rather unimportant that we agree with each other on our political agendas, but it is crucial that we do not impede the progress of others' fights against prejudice. We must cease our comparing of oppressions, for no group has it worse off than another, and begin to focus our energies against the fascist forces within America.

We must come to accept that minorities have unique differences and work toward educating ourselves on the conflicts of other peoples. Education is the primary way in which we can build respect for another person's struggle, and it is this knowledge which will enable us to dismantle the prejudices which have built up in our own communities as well as in others. This mutual respect will serve as the first step in directing our energy against the power structure and away from each other.

It has been encouraging to see the recent letters defying 200 foot walls of fascism and petitions disassociating dorms from racial graffiti. However, we cannot simply clean our consciences and wait until the next incident arrives. We must attack the racism, anti-Semitism, homophobia and all other oppressions through the co-educational programs and by confronting prejudices in our own communities and homes. It is not only the right thing to do, but it is also in our own best interest.

As Martin Niemoellet, the German pastor who spent eight years in a Nazi concentration camp, reminds us, "When they came for the Communists, I didn't speak up because I wasn't a Communist. When they came for the Jews, I didn't speak up because I wasn't a Jew. Then they came for the Catholics, and I didn't speak up because I wasn't a Catholic. . . Then they came for me, and by that time there was no one left to speak up."

Chainsmoker, why not transfer to a school that you can be proud of?

In response to the editorial titled "Chainsmoker with an offer," by Chris J. Petropoulos, we, the tour guides at UMass, feel compelled to respond.

Why did you feel it necessary to write such an editorial? Do you enjoy going around campus, making the University look unfavorable to visiting prospective students?

There are many reasons for conducting tours. It gives us the opportunity to show prospective students some of what the University has to offer. BDIC, Honors Program, athletics and the wide variety of majors offered here make the University the successful educational institution it is today.

University tour guides are trained to give tours for prospective students. Tours are given twice a day, seven days a week, year-round. Although giving tours is made much more challenging by student hecklers such as yourself, we take pride in our school and wish to share our experience with others. This is supported by professors and local community members who, despite economic hardship, still remain loyal to the University's mission and its student body.

We feel that if you are unhappy with the quality of the education that is offered here, you may want to spend your time by researching potential schools which could better suit your needs.

GOP negative campaigning giving Tsongas nightmares

By CECI CONNOLLY
Associated Press

BOSTON — Some Democrats still have nightmares from 1988: Boston police endorsing George Bush, Willie Horton ads, and Michael Dukakis barely flinching when asked what he'd do if his wife was raped.

Judging from his behavior, presidential contender Paul Tsongas has been tossing and turning over the same nightmares.

All of the Democrats portray themselves as tough leaders who won't take attacks wittingly. But for Tsongas in particular, who shares obvious traits with Dukakis and once suffered from cancer, the need is perhaps greatest.

"It would be impossible to understate how badly it hurt Dukakis," said Norman Ornstein, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. "For Tsongas, being a Greek from Massachusetts means he has to work even harder to make sure nobody mistakes him for Dukakis."

Betty Taymour, a Democratic National Committee member and political scientist at Boston College, said Tsongas must combat fears he is not physically fit. "He cannot look weak."

Even Dukakis agreed he "did a lousy job" of responding to Bush's blistering attacks. Bush embarrassed Dukakis in his home state with the police endorsement and capitalized on publicity surrounding Horton, a convicted murderer who raped a woman while on furlough.

"Whoever the nominee is, they better be ready for the attack campaign," Dukakis said in a phone interview. "Forewarned is to be forearmed."

So Tsongas, who stayed out of the fray for months, is delivering what he calls a counterpunch.

"The fact is the campaign has become too nasty," he said in Boston last week, "I had to demonstrate I could do the same thing they do."

In a televised debate in Denver, Gov. Bill Clinton accused Tsongas of planning to build "hundreds more" nuclear power plants.

"That is a lie, that is a lie, that is a lie," Tsongas retorted in a slow, deep, deliberate voice.

In campaign stops afterward, Tsongas noted he refrained from criticizing Clinton during unsubstantiated reports of womanizing and draft dodging.

"I did not say a word about Bill Clinton during his troubles," Tsongas said. "I thought there would be better behavior on his part."

Massachusetts is the third biggest prize in the so-called Super Tuesday primaries. For the Democrats, 96 delegates are at stake, just behind Texas and Florida. Republicans will send 38 delegates from the state to their convention.

Sixty-nine percent of Republicans who expect to vote on Tuesday supported President Bush, compared with 16 percent who said they support GOP challenger Patrick Buchanan. Thirteen percent were undecided, and 1 percent backed former Ku Klux Klansman David Duke.

However, only 51 percent of Republican voters said they would vote for Bush because he "deserved re-nomination." Three in 10 voters said they wished there were other GOP alternatives.

The poll was conducted Wednesday and Thursday among 800 people likely to vote in the primary.

Delegates golden in primary

Bay State has 96 Dem., 38 Rep. seats

By CECI CONNOLLY
Associated Press

BOSTON — In presidential sweepstakes, winning truly isn't everything. Sometimes close is enough.

"The campaigns must remember there are really two competitions," said Ann Lewis, former political director of the Democratic National Committee. "One is for press and public attention; the second parallel competition is for the delegates."

And in this week's Super Tuesday primary, Massachusetts will play a significant role in the delegate race. Bay State Republicans will determine which candidate receives 38 delegates up for grabs, while democratic voters will apportion 96.

Enen though the delegate process is computed by mathematical formulas, it's hardly simple math.

Sen. Tom Harkin, for example, led the delegate count in late February, even though he trailed in every other measure. That's because Harkin collected 40 of Iowa's 57 delegates. Former Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas, credited with a more significant electoral win in New Hampshire, nevertheless received just 10 out of that state's 24 delegates.

Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton, who has just one victory under his belt, leads Tsongas in delegates 116-107, and 82 members of the Democratic National Committe say they support Clinton.

Large states like California, Illinois and Massachusetts take on greater importance not because their voters are more adept at choosing presidents, but because they boast hundreds of delegates. A candidate can easily win dozens of tiny states and still trail in the delegates.

On the democratic side, a presidential candidate needs at least 15 percent of the vote in a congressional district to qualify for delegates.

Republican contenders need a mere 2.631 percent in each district, said party spokesman Alan Safran.

"It's done on a strict percentage basis, so every vote counts," he said, noting 2.630 percent isn't enough to secure a delegate.

Here's how the process works in Massachusetts:

After all the votes have been counted Tuesday, party officials compute how many delgates each candidate has earned. The Democratic Party also inisists the delegates be equally divided by gender and include an ethnic mix.

This spring, wanna-be delegates will compete at caucuses around the state. Any registered voter may participate.

Once the delegates arrive at the National conventions this summer, both parties expect them to support their candidates on the first ballot, but that doesn't always happen.

'Til Tuesday's beautiful voices carry fans away

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

'Til Tuesday
Pearl St. Nightclub
March 6, 1992

'Til Tuesday's tremendous set was far more luminous than the neon cityscape they faced upstairs in Pearl St. on Friday.

The floor was packed with the appreciative 21-and-up crowd, who managed to bring Aimee Mann, the lead singer, and the group out for three encores.

Mann popped out onto the floor in a simple black shirt, tinted glasses and her bobbed blonde hair which gave her a mature New York City chic, a bit different from her earlier punkier days.

Her beautifully twangy, familiar voice really began to warm up with "Telescope" the song she had written with Elvis Costello.

Mann even managed to throw around a joke or two, "How many members of U2 does it take to screw in a lightbulb? One. Bono holds up the bulb and the rest of the world revolves around him."

Their new song, "Put Me on Top," ("You guessed what it's about," smiles Mann) impressed with its energy, a nice back bone to the band's generally mellow tone.

As for that question that is on everyone's mind, "When's the next album?" Mann replied, "No one has any idea when or where or on what label it will come out on."

"Everything's Different Now," the song written by Jules Shear with Matthew Sweet, turned the audience into a swaying ocean of heads, rolling to the soothing melody.

Another highlight of the performance was "Angels," where Mann, easily the most energetic member of the group, really began to rock.

"This is the first time that I have. . . rocked," admitted Mann, commenting on the electric guitar she was playing.

Her buoyant sense of humor would shine through in her teasing of the other band members. "This is where I humiliate him and make him dance," Mann said of the lead guitar player. The two then did a few cute synchronized dips with their guitars and made the audience giggle.

There was also an impetuous "Happy Birthday" sung to one of the stage hands, Brendan. "Even if you think we suck," sang Mann.

The moment I half dreaded and half anticipated, the performance of that very overplayed, immensely popular song "Voices Carry" finally came.

The band mercifully "changed it up" and produced an incredible rendition pumped up with tons of bass.

Remember those words? "He wants me/ but only part of the time. He wants me/but only if he can keep me in line."

'Til Tuesday's lyrics, though often bordering on the morbid, seem to be able to touch that deep sentimental chord in all of us. It goes a bit deeper than the current rage, Right Said Fred's "I'm too sexy for this song."

During the Big Finale, Aimee and the group invited all of the people in the audience that had been requesting the song, "Love in a Vaccuum" to come onto the stage.

The stage was instantly packed with their glowing faces and the whole bunch of them sang back up for the band.

As 'Til Tuesday walked off the stage with their Rolling Rocks in hand the audience roared its appreciation. Before she left, the terminally polite Mann, who thanked the audience after every single song, apologized for inadvertently spitting on the front line of the crowd.

The band seems to have been in hibernation since their last album. Mann declined an interview because she said there was "nothing to talk about." It seems that there is at least new material in the works, however.

In 1982, the band was born. In 1984 the band won first place in WBCN's annual "Rock and Roll Rumble," which led to their Epic signing which ended with the making of their last album, Everything's Different Now.

The band won MTV's "Best new Artist Award" in 1985 with the release of their gold album, Voices Carry. 'Til Tuesday's influences can be traced back to mid-Sixties folk rock.

The opening band, apparently an offshoot of the original band, sounded remarkably like 'Til Tuesday which wasn't surprising since about three-quarters of 'Til Tuesday was in it.

Funny As You Like It reaches modern audience

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

The signs have been cropping up all over campus — "I luv Ror," written gracelessly in black paint, and affixed to buildings, telephone poles, and elevator doors. These somewhat inept declarations are attributable, indirectly, to an amorous Englishman of the fifteenth century.

He is Orlando, the main character of As You Like It, and his signs lead back to Hampshire College's Red Barn Theatre — where a promising new production is about to begin performances.

As You Like It is classic Shakespearian comedy, replete with cross dressing and wordplay, but under the direction of Christopher Werler it has been given a newer, contemporary slant.

"It's not a question of reproducing the way it was," explains Werler, dismissing a purely historical approach as ineffective in reaching a modern audience. "We are searching the text, to find what has meaning for us today."

Among the play's broadest issues are the male domination of society, and the restrictions of class, but Werler is not interested in making the play a loud political statement. Rather, he hopes to make the cast relate simply to basic human situations — reasoning that if they understand all they are doing, they will be able to share that understanding with their audience. Much of Werler's concept involves the interaction between actors and audience— something made much easier by the intimate nature of the Red Barn Theatre.

Certainly, the cast should match it's audience in diversity. A sixteen-strong group, they represent all five colleges (as well as a local high school) and range in ages from the mid-teens to the mid-thirties.

That one of the performers is a trained circus clown helps to show that Werler has not lost sight of the most important fact of all — "As You Like It" is a comedy, and the people in it are comic characters. Among the play's populace: Orlando, a strapping wrestler with a soft spot for a princess and an affinity for romantic graffiti; Rosalind and Celia, two disenfranchised princesses who embark on a forest odyssey like an Elizabethan Thelma and Louise; and Touchstone, the obligatory wisecracking clown.

"This isn't real life," says Werler, "it's a suggestion of what real life might be like. . . It's all the funny and exciting moments in life, compiled into two hours."

"As You Like It" was compiled by a master, and adapted to a new understanding in modern times. Get your tickets while they last.

As You Like It is being performed from March 10-13 at the Red Barn Theatre, Hampshire College. Tickets are available from the UMass FAC Box Office, the Hampshire College Store, or at the door.

Dino Jr. gives ferocious, flailing set

By ALYSSA MARCHESE
Collegian Correspondent

Dinosaur, Jr.
Vertex
March 4, 1992

Dinosaur Jr. took the stage at the Vertex shortly after 11 p.m. Wednesday night, and within minutes, the coralled-off dance floor undulated with stage-diving, pogoing masses of disaffected youth. The sociologists and spies of popular culture ominously call them the "X generation;" apathetic, confused and cynical. Since the inception of Dino Jr., J. Mascis has emerged as one of several high priests of hip, by providing a guiding light through the 90s.

The rolling of the ball toward canonization in the Church of the Rock Star Icon began in 1985 with their debut album, Dinosaur. A small supernova of a record, it garnered a series of heavy comparisons, induced by its virtual painter's palette of rock and roll's subtly shaded hues.

Mascis' languidly anguished vocals are most commonly compared to Neil Young; the raucously layered guitars evoke Sonic Youth or the Meat Puppets.

It'd been five months since Dinosaur Jr. graced the stage of a local venue, not counting a few random sittings of Mascis record-browsing downtown.

Their gig with clamorous compatriots Gobblehoof in the Student Union Ballroom last October left the crowd sweaty and sated and deliriously deaf and dizzy with love and worship for the homegrown masters of melodic rock; lead vocalist and guitarist Mascis, drummer Murph and recently recruited bassist Mike Johnson.

Equal in resplendence, last night's show stared and ended with a mighty roar, never lapsing in it's ferocity. Although the band's repertoire neglected its brilliant first album, the show stood as a virtual jewel-mine, as Mascis summoned up gem after gem with a laconic jerk of his guitar neck. Collectively, they rode the crowd through a raw, flailing 60 minute set.

Highlights included their warped and wacky cover off the Cure's "Just Like Heaven," filled with more angst than Robert Smith could muster up in a lifetime. "Whatevers Cool With Me," "Blowin' It," and "The Lung" joyously crutched along, as the guitar-drenched fans headbanged and hairtossed in pure rapture. Like an unpolished diamond, Dinosaur Jr. rocked raggedly, but sparkled brightly just the same.

Gobblehoof opened the show, offering up a descent into heavy metal hell. Lead singer Charlie Nakajima exhibited his satanic stage presence and golden throat, leaving no note unsung in their extremely tight and impressive 50-minute set.

around competition, taking first, second and third place. Junior Steve Christensen, who took home a medal in five out of six events, finished in first place in the all-around competition with a score of 54.95 points. He captured first place on pommel horse (9.30), second place on floor exercise (9.45), third place on parallel bars (9.1), fourth place on high bar (9.15), and sixth place on still rings (9.0).

Sophomore Joe Haran, the second place all-around finisher, scored 54.05 points which was enough to beat out teammate Cal Booker who finished the all-around in third place with 53.65 points.

Haran finished first on the high bar with a score of 9.45. He also placed second on parallel bars (9.15) and fourth on pommel horse (8.45) and floor exercise (9.20).

Third place finisher Booker, who currently holds the school all-around record (55.20) as well as the school record on floor exercise (9.70) scored a 9.55 on floor exercise yesterday, which was enough to take first place on the event.

As well as capturing the floor exercise championship, Booker finished in first place on the vault with a score of 9.45. In addition to the two first place finishes, Booker finished in third place on high bar with a score of 9.30, and in fifth place on parallel bars with a score of 8.95.

UMass junior Glenn Stubbs scored a 9.15 on still rings, taking second place in the event, and sophomore Jason Braud finished in second place on the vault with a score of 9.40.

The Minutemen now begin preparing for next weekends Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championships which will be held at James Madison University in Virginia. This will be the final stage of preparation for "the big one" as Johnson refers to it.

The Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics Championship will be held the following weekend at UMass in the Curry Hicks Cage.

Women's gymnastics defeats New Hampshire

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

After beating Rutgers on the road last week 182.75-182.00, University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics coach Alfie Mitchell was afraid that his team might suffer a letdown last Friday night against arch-rival University of New Hampshire.

Much to his delight, no such letdown took place as his squad impressed the crowd at the Boyden Gymnasium, beating the number two-ranked team in the Northeast, UNH, 186.2-185.4.

The 186.2 points were a season high for the UMass gymnasts.

"This was such a big win for us," junior Tammy Marshall said. "Going into this meet, no one really knew what to expect. Everyone knew UNH was tough and very confident but we thought that if we could hit our routines consistently, we might be able to win.

"We were trailing by .45 entering the last event [the floor] so we really had to pull together as a team," she said. "Fortunately we won that event and clinched the victory."

Leading UMass in the floor event was Sophomore Margaret Furtado, who placed first with a 9.6. She was followed by teammate Gina Demeo (a freshman), who clinched the victory for the Minutewomen by scoring a 9.4.

Furtado also placed second in the all-around (38.2) behind the Wildcats' Laurie Brady who scored an impressive 38.25. UMass' Marshall claimed third by scoring 37.75.

UMass finally had a good meet on the beam as the tandem of Marshall, who wrapped up first place (9.6), and Freshman Emily Lueck (9.2) hit solid routines.

"We've had our troubles on the beam all year," Marshall said. "I think we picked the right meet to finally start hitting our routines in this event."

Marshall also placed second in the vault exercise, scoring a team high 9.7.

Although UMass didn't perform up to par on the bars, it still managed to produce some solid scores as Angela Gent had the team high score with a 9.3. Next for the UMass gymnasts was Erica Baum, who scored 9.1.

"UNH was really tough in the bars but we didn't perform that well either," Baum said. "I'm just really happy we could come together as a team and beat a team of this caliber."

Tonight, UMass will have its last home meet of the year at 5 p.m. against a tough University of Illinois at Chicago squad. "This will definitely be a challenge for us," Marshall said. "So far this year, we really haven't performed as well as we're capable of because of injuries and other things so I really hope we do [perform well] at this meet.

"We need a really high score tonight so we can count the [team high] 186.2 from Friday night toward the post season," she said.

Host UMass captures New England crown

Emotions ran high Sunday in Boyden Gymnasium, where the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team scored a season-high 267.65 points to win the New England Collegiate Gymnastics Championship.

"I am very happy with the way everything went," said head coach Roy Johnson. "We have been working hard all season and it is nice to see the results."

Springfield College, the team that Johnson had expected to be the top challenger to the Minutemen in yesterday's meet, finished in second place with 259.00 points. The Chiefs were trailing by only three points after the first three events, but struggled in the second half.

"I had expected [Springfield] to look much better," said Johnson. "I think that after the first half, once they realized that they were behind a little, they didn't think they would be able to come back and they just fell apart."

Southern Connecticut, a team that was hoping to avenge a 20-point loss suffered at the hands of the Minutemen last Tuesday in Boyden failed to do so, finishing in third place with 250.55 points.

The University of Vermont scored a season high 239.90 points to finish in fourth place, and the gymnasts from Massachusetts Institute of Technology finished in last place scoring 178.95 points.

On the way to capturing the championship title, the gymnasts from UMass won all six events, highlighted by a 46.05 point performance on vault. A score just five hundredths of a point less then the all time school record of 46.10 points.

The team also performed strongly on floor exercise, scoring 45.75 points, and finishing over a point ahead of second place Springfield who scored 44.70.

The pommel horse, which has been the one consistent trouble spot for the Minutemen throughout the season, again troubled the gymnasts from UMass. But even struggling they took first place on the event with a score of 42.30. Springfield (40.40) finished second on pommel horse.

"It's nice to know that we can struggle on one event (pommel horse) and still do so well overall," said Johnson.

UMass gymnasts swept the all-

UMass advances to A-10 semifinals with 106-94 win

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA, Pa. — You have to marvel at the effort the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team put forth last night in its Atlantic 10 quarterfinal tournament game against Rutgers.

The Minutemen (26-4) had all the answers. Each time Rutgers (15-14) threatened to get within striking distance, the Minutemen responded, whether it be Harper Williams from the inside or Jim McCoy from the outside. They had it all going last night. Even the recently quiet Tony Barbee chipped in with 21 points, as the Minutemen rolled to a 106-94 win in front of a raucous 8,722 fans at the Palestra.

UMass coach John Calipari said the team was insulted because none of its players were selected to either the second or third All-Conference teams.

"The media left a lot of our guys off the All-Conference team and I think it got them a little angry," said Calipari. "It got the guys fired up."

UMass faces Rhode Island, who they have beaten twice this season tonight in the semifinals at 9 p.m. in the Palestra. The other semifinal game matches West Virginia against Temple.

UMass went on a 21-7 run in the final 4:39 of the first half to take a commanding 57-44 halftime lead, breaking a one-point game wide open.

Steve Worthy (32 points) scored Rutgers' first eight points of the second half to get the Scarlet Knights within 7 (61-54). However, Jim McCoy, who was visually upset after not winning the A-10 Player of the Year award Saturday, scored seven consecutive points to give the Minutemen a 70-58 lead with 16:01 remaining. McCoy finished with 21 points.

"We had a lot of guys who were angry that they weren't on certain teams," McCoy said. "I think my team got shortchanged. I think we wanted to go out and try to prove something. We'll see what happens at the end of the tournament. We'll see what the media says then."

William Herndon (16 points on 8-for-8 shooting) took an Anton Brown lob some two feet above the rim for the most authoritative alley-oop of the season, giving UMass a 73-60 lead.

Worthy, Jamal Philips (16 points) and Alvin Rich (17 points) all scored in a 43-second span, to cut UMass' lead to 73-66. They were within 8 (79-71) with 11:53 left, when Worthy was slapped with a technical foul, which was Rutgers' second of the game.

Worthy sat with four fouls and UMass got possession of the ball.

"Certainly the technical on Steve didn't help," said Rutgers coach Bob Wenzel. "But the credit goes to Massachusetts. Because they found answers to the things we did."

"[Referee Tim Higgins] looked at me and I looked at him and I smiled," Worthy said. "I guess he was trying to prove his point — who was in charge of the game."

When Rutgers next touched the ball, it trailed 82-71. From there, the Minutemen blew it open, as Harper Williams (19 points, 16 rebounds) and Barbee padded their statistics.

For the game, UMass shot a torrid 58 percent from the floor. It got a strong game from Lou Roe (11 points, 9 boards) and some big baskets from Mike Williams (9 points).

Rutgers shot well (50 percent from the floor), but it did not have the bodies to run with UMass.

UMass' 106 points is an A-10 tournament record for most points in a game.

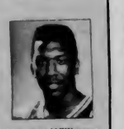
Player of the game



Harper Williams, the 1992 A-10 Player of the Year, lived up to his billing as he scored 19 points and grabbed a game-high 16 rebounds for his second consecutive and sixth double-double of the season. Williams also had game highs in blocks (2) and steals (4) in 30 minutes of action.

Why UMass won
The Minutemen were just too talented for the Scarlet Knights, as five UMass players scored in double figures for the tenth time this season. Tony Barbee and Jim McCoy each scored 21 points. After a slow start and tying the game at 34 at 5:19 left in the first half, the Minutemen got hot and went on a 23-10 run to tie their season high of 57 points in the first half. UMass shot 62.5 percent from the field in the first half and Rutgers shot 42 percent. Mike Williams (9) Louis Roe (11) Jerome Malloy (4) combined for 24 points off the bench. UMass scored 48 points in the paint, while Rutgers had 34.

UMass' next opponent
The Minutemen take on No. 4 seed Rhode Island, who beat George Washington yesterday, 75-66, for the second time in a week. Last Wednesday, UMass beat the Rams at the Cage, 96-88. Anton Brown paced UMass with 22 points, while URI's Jeff Kent scored 35. Kent and teammate Andre Samuel led the Rams over GW with 15 apiece while Abdul Fox came off the bench to score 14. UMass enters the game with a 10-game winning streak against Atlantic 10 opponents and 15 of their last 16. Rhode Island has been struggling of late, losing four of their last six against A-10 opponents.

Williams named top player in A-10

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA, Pa. — University of Massachusetts forward Harper Williams was presented the Atlantic 10 Conference's Player of the Year Award Saturday evening in Philadelphia — but he didn't hold onto it for long.

As the junior from Bridgeport, Conn. walked up to the podium to accept the honor, he thanked his coaches, but especially teammate Jim McCoy who said he deserved the award presented to him.

I would like to thank one player, Jim McCoy," Williams said at the A-10 Conference championship banquet. "All season, he took a lot of pressure off of me and other players focused on him which allowed me to do other things. I would like to give this award to Jim McCoy," he said.

"The two of us combined should be a co-award," Williams said after the presentation. "Our points combined average up to an MVP status. He gave up a lot of his game so we could win."

Williams, who was a third-team all-conference selection last season, led the regular season A-10 champions in rebounding, with 7.2 per game while averaging 13.6 points and 1.9 blocks per contest.

UMass' all-time leading scorer, McCoy, led the Minutemen with an average of 16.2 points per game.

* * * *

Rutgers freshman Jamal Phillips was named the Altantic 10's Freshman of the Year. The forward is the second on the Scarlet Knights with an average of 10.3 points per game while pulling down a team-best 5.6 rebounds per game.

UMass' Lou Roe, who finished the regular season with an average of 6.9 points per game and 6.1 rebounds per game, was named to the All-Freshman team. Joining Roe and Phillips were Jason Alexander (Rhode Island), Ganon Baker (Duquesne), Demetrius Poles (St. Joseph's), and David Vanterpool (St. Bonaventure).

The A-10 second team consists of seniors James Hargrove (Duquesne), Jeff Kent (Rhode Island), and Chris Leonard (West Virginia), junior Steve Worthy (Rutgers) and sophomore Derrick Alston (Duquense).

The third-team consists of seniors Craig Ames (St. Joseph's) Mik Kilgore (Temple) and Mark Strickland (Temple) junior Sonni Holland (George Wahington) and sophomores Aaron Mickie (Temple) and Harry Moore (St. Bonaventure).

Steve Worthy of Rutgers was names the A-10's Newcomer of the Year.

Rhode Island head coach Al Skinner was named A-10 Coach of the Year for leading the Rams to a 19-8 regular season record.

UMass rallies past URI into A-10 final

Williams scores 20 in 78-67 victory

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA, Pa.—Last night, in the City of Brotherly Love, the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team continued its stampede across the Atlantic 10, beating Rhode Island for the third time this season, 78-67, to advance to the A-10 tournament finals Thursday night against West Virginia at the Curry Hicks Cage.

But it wasn't easy.

The Minutemen (27-4) trailed 61-58 with 5:19 left to play in the game, before they came together and mustered up all they needed to dispatch of a Rhode Island team which definitely struck fear in the heart of UMass.

William Herndon (7 points, 9 rebounds) finished a 3-on-2 fast break with a dunk to pull the Minutemen within 1 (61-60). From there, Harper Williams (20 points, including 16 in the second half) hit a bank shot and a free throw to give UMass a 63-60 lead.

The Minutemen would score the next 10 points to complete an impressive 15-0 run.

Herndon made an off-balance leaner and Williams' short hook upped the lead to 67-60 with 2:32 remaining. The

Former Israeli leader eulogized at funeral

By KARIN LAUB
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Former Prime Minister Menachem Begin was buried Monday after being carried to his grave on the Mount of Olives by aging comrades in arms from Israel's war for statehood.

Thousands of Israelis, some in tears, accompanied Begin's body to the cemetery in Arab east Jerusalem where he was laid to rest next to his wife, Aliza.

Begin, who died Monday at age 78, was a giant of the Jewish state, but he wanted — and got — a people's funeral. There was no coffin. He was carried to the grave on a stretcher, wrapped in a prayer shawl.

With Begin's death, his friends finally began to explain the riddle of his 1983 resignation. They confirmed what most Israelis long suspected — he stepped down because he was depressed over his wife's death a year earlier and because of the rising Israeli death toll in the Lebanon war.

The complexities of the Arab-Israeli conflict lent symbolism to Begin's funeral.

The Jewish cemetery on the Mount of Olives predates the conflict, but the area is in the part of Jerusalem that Israel captured in the 1967 Middle East war and annexed. Begin's burial there can only stiffen Jewish resolve to hold on the area.

Some branded Begin a terrorist for the tactics his underground army, the Irgun, used to oust the British and achieve Israeli statehood. Begin always called his guerrilla years his finest moment, and aging comrades honored their commander by carrying the stretcher with the body to the grave.

They brought a handful of earth from the grave of Irgun men hanged by the British. At the end of the funeral, some mourners unexpectedly sang the anthem of Betar, Begin's ideological movement.

Otherwise, the ceremony was broken only by the occasional sobs of Begin's daughter, Hasia. His other daughter, Leah, also attended, along with some grandchildren.

His son Benjamin, a 48-year-old member of Parliament who is considered a possible future prime minister, recited

Harkin abandons presidential hopes

By JILL LAWRENCE
Associated Press

AP photo

Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, wipes away a tear Monday in Des Moines, Iowa, as he announces he is withdrawing from the race for the presidential nomination.

WASHINGTON — Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin departed the Democratic presidential field Monday the same way he entered it — an unrepentant liberal convinced that his party's salvation lies in its past.

In a speech that paid homage to Hubert Humphrey, Harkin called Democrats "The party of hope and opportunity for all those. . . who want to fulfill their God-given potential, who just want to be part of the American Dream."

Harkin preached a populist Democratic gospel that promised deep defense cuts and a massive public works program in the style of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

His exit raised an immediate problem for hard-core liberal and labor voters who had seen him as their best hope.

Harkin's showing were dismal except in the Iowa, Minnesota and Idaho caucuses; he emerged from South Carolina's primary Saturday with a 6 percent vote total and a $300,00 campaign debt.

Most primary-season voters spurned Harkin and Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerry, in favor of two candidates trying to lead their party away from liberal orthodoxies — Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton and former Massachusetts Sen. Paul Tsongas.

"It says absolutely nothing about liberalism," said pollster Mark Mellman. "Tom Harkin's failure was not so much a failure of ideas as it was a failure of the way he conveyed them. He was a superb vehicle for venting anger and venting frustration. But voters this year were also looking for solutions."

Bill Carrick, who managed Rep. Richard Gephardt's 1988 presidential campaign, agreed that Harkin "never seemed to bridge the gap from Bush-bashing to a more substantive message that he had an economic plan to get the economy moving again."

"I see a lot of people not ready to sign on with Clinton or Tsongas," said former Rep. Toby Moffett of Connecticut, who served in the House with Harkin and assisted his presidential bid.

Harkin was backed by most unions in Michigan and Illinois, which hold primaries next week. Clinton apparently is drawing much of that support and the organizational muscle that goes with it.

Clinton already has some support among white-collar unionists and favors a key item on the labor agenda that Tsongas opposed: a federal law banning the permanent replacement of striking workers.

Clinton aides reported overtures in the past few weeks from unions that either had remained neutral or endorsed Harkin. One Harkin adviser who insisted on anonymity said "labor leaders started playing footsie with Clinton a long time ago" despite their nominal support for Harkin.

Some Harkin supporters said they were tempted by former California Gov. Jerry Brown.

Author describes experiences with L.A. gangs

By SARAH LEVESQUE
Collegian Correspondent

In the media, gang members are portrayed as faceless, mysterious and violent, according to an author who has spent extensive time with several Los Angeles gangs.

Leon Bing, author of the recent best-selling book, Do Or Die, spoke of her journalistic involvement with the Los Angeles gangs the Bloods and Crips to a crowd of over six hundred people in the Campus Center Auditorium last night.

She was joined by two former L.A. gang members, O.G. L'il Monster of the "Eight Trey Crips" and O.G. Kalikoat of the "Athens Park Boy Bloods," both of whom are touring with Bing and who added greatly to the emotional and powerful dialogue with the audience.

"You don't find Little Leagues in Watts or Compton. You find overcrowded classes and the effects of no social services," Bing said. "That was yanked away twelve years ago. You see a community that is being strip-mined of all hope."

"This is the environment that these African-American youngsters grew up in. Unwelcomed in their own country, but the first to fight in the frontlines of our nation's wars," Bing told the audience.

Leon Bing first began writing about the topic that interests her most, "disenfranchised youth," in the mid-eighties. Her first article was about a group of young squatters in Venice, California.

In the 1960s, she was a successful fashion model, most notably associated with designer Rudi Gernreich. In 1968 she appeared with Gernreich and Peggy Moffit on the cover of Time Magazine.

"I began working on what would become my book Do or Die about five years ago. I just started on my own. How I got my first interview was I went up to this fourteen year-old who was taking tickets at a cinema and asked him, 'Would you by any chance know where some gang memebers hang out?' He just kind of looked at me and then said, 'Yeah. I know where a whole bunch hang out.' And he took me there," Bing said.

Her book was published by Harper Collins Publishers. Portions of the book had appeared in Rolling Stone, L.A. Weekly and Harper's Magazine.

"Part of the royalties are going back to those involved with the book. The homies will decide how to split it up," Bing said.

Bing spoke of how for years, and even today in the media, much of the gang coverage was "faceless, with no sense of humanity."

"When I went into their world [L.A. Crips and Bloods], I wasn't afraid because I was myself, I was honest. . . They treat me with the same respect I give them. . . but there are subtle tests for outsiders," Bing said.

O. G. L'il Monster, addressing a question about "what are the solutions to the gang situation" spoke of the need for jobs in the Black community and a focus on social programs.

"I'm not talking about gangs. I'm talking about reaching out to another human being," L'il Monster said.

L'il Monster addressed the way gangs are perceived through the media.

"Why are we referred to as gangs and the Ku Klux Klan is called an organization?" L'il Monster asked.

L'il Monster told the crowd, "When you drive through Beverly Hills, there are no liquor stores on every corner," in response to a question about genecide in the Black community.

"Now you see all these announcements about 'Don't do drugs' only because it is now touching [mainstream society] where they never thought it would," L'il Monster said.

Bing added, "We are a nation committed to violence. . . We are a nation obsessed with the rights of the unborn, yet no one seems to give a [expletive] about kids! They get trashed! We must redirect to save our children that are here."

Gay group waits on parade vote

BOSTON (AP) — A gay pride group that threatened a court battle in order to march in a St. Patrick's Day parade waited Monday to see whether a ban against it would be reversed.

Sponsors of the March 15 parade voted last week to ban the Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Pride Committee, citing concerns that its presence might spark violence.

Since then, the gay pride group has signed an agreement that no more than 25 members would march and that they would not disrupt the parade.

The South Boston Allied War Veterans Council, the parade sponsors, were scheduled to vote Monday night on an amended parade application that included the written agreement.

Gay activists had planned to file suit Monday to force a reversal of the ban. But Barbara Kay, the group's leader, said she would wait to see the outcome of the vote.

"We really want to respect the day and march as Irish Americans," said Kay. "We thought it would be a really neat thing to march to celebrate our Irishness and be fully who we are. We thought it would show diversity in both communities."

A similar dispute erupted in New York, where organizers of that city's St. Patrick's Day parade have asked a federal judge to grant permission to exclude gay activists.

Key said Boston activists had met with police, parade organizers and representatives from the mayor's office for the past month to discuss safety precautions.

Kay said the police department had agreed to have 10 plainclothes officers march with the group, and gay activists thought the matter had been settled.

But James Kelly, a city councilor from South Boston, said the gays only wanted to get into the parade to stir up trouble.

"This is simply an effort to get into the parade to create a disturbance," Kelly said. "Despite the agreement, I don't believe them. Their only intent is to generate media attention."

Sarah Wunsch, a staff attorney for the Massachusetts Civil Liberties Union, said the parade was being run as a joint venture between the veterans council and the city.

"Because of the fact it's our view that is a public event, and you can't exclude people from a public event based on sexual preference," Wunsch said.

the Jewish prayer for the dead.

Begin's three children spent most of the past six days by his hospital bed in Tel Aviv. He had been on life-support machinery since suffering a heart attack last week.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir watched silently as sacks of soil were dumped in the grave and a plain marker with Begin's name was stuck in the earth.

The diplomatic corps was not invited, and the speedy burial left no time for foreign dignitaries to arrive. But Egyptian Ambassador Mohammed Bassiouni attended privately, as a gesture to the man who made peace with his country in 1979, Israel army radio said.

Israel television and radio stations broadcast the ceremony live.

Begin was remembered primarily as the man whose ready response to an offer from the then-Egyptian president, Anwar Sadat, led to Israel's only peace treaty with an Arab neighbor.

MassPIRG fee given second chance

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts' Amherst chapter of MassPIRG is campaigning to reaffirm student support on campus, according to MassPIRG members.

During the past two weeks, student members of the campus chapter have collected almost 3,000 signatures to put a question on the Student Government ballot for today's and tomorrow's election. The question asks students if they support the chapter's existence through a semesterly $4 waivable fee that appears on the tuition bill.

"We do the reaffirmation voluntarily every few years to take new students into account," said MassPIRG staffer Heidi Hill.

"There has always been a record of higher student voter turnout for the Student Government elections in years that our reaffirmation is on the ballot," she said.

The first chapter of the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, or MassPIRG, was originated by students on the Amherst campus in 1972. Currently, 26 college campuses in Massachusetts have MassPIRG chapters.

The $4 negative check-off fee appears on students' tuition bills and can be waived by checking a designated box on the bill.

The waivable fee system is the sole source of funding for college and university chapters of MassPIRG across the state. Citizen chapters are funded differently.

Last December Gov. Weld signed a bill which would have jeopardized student MassPIRG funding by outlawing the negative check-off fee system and only allowing a positive check-off fee system to organizations which lobby in Boston.

With the positive check-off fee system, students would have to indicate they would like to give money to MassPIRG in the first place. Kira Sanbonmatsu, a senior political science major and representative on the MassPIRG board of directors, said previously that MassPIRG chapters that have tried to operate on an optional fee system have simply "died out."

The bill was deemed by many as a retaliatory measure against MassPIRG for the successful lobbying they do in Boston.

State Senator Stan Rosenberg, who represents the First Hampshire District, supports a positive check-off fee system but does not approve of the "underhanded way the legislators have gone about it."

"I feel the negative check-off fee policy is inherently anti-consumer," said Rosenberg. "I think people should make their own choice to become a financial supporter of an organization like that."

Women AIDS victims on rise

Panel says advocacy needed to combat 'epidemic'

By SARAH LEVESQUE
Collegian Correspondent

In commemoration of International Women's Day, three AIDS activists and educators at Smith College Sunday discussed the importance of advocacy and health care for the growing number of women infected with the HIV virus.

The panel presentation, titled "Women and AIDS: Honduras, Puerto Rico and Holyoke," included activists Dalila Balfour, Idali Torres and Gladys Lebron. The program was sponsored by the Central America Working Group of the American Friends Service Committee, the Smith College Chapel and the Holyoke based Center for Education During Pregnancy.

Balfour discussed Honduran women and the AIDS epidemic. She said U.S. military involvement in Honduras has led to an increase in prostitution.

"In 1980 there were only 25 military persons situated in Honduras — now there are over 80,000 U.S. troops there," Balfour said. "Prostitution has proliferated and now so has the number of people who have the HIV virus.

Balfour also spoke of how the Honduran government initially dealt with the emergence of AIDS.

"In 1985, there were only four cases of AIDS known: four female prostitutes," Balfour said. "Then one day, the bodies of two of the women were found in a river which the locals would not drink from or swim in for fear of getting AIDS."

Torres said the situation for Puerto Rican women is extremely serious.

"Puerto Rico is ranked fourth out of all the states for having the most people with clinical AIDS," Torres said.

She stressed the seriousness of the situation and the need to deal with the problem. "Women are finally being acknowledged for also being high-risk and needing medical attention. The legacy of women as care givers is also being acknowledged," Torres said.

Lebron addressed the impact of AIDS on the local level of Holyoke. She also spoke of her personal experiences as an advocate and the importance of advocacy for women infected with HIV and those with full-blown AIDS.

"We must work with the community as a whole. There is so much stigma attached to a woman with AIDS. We must break down these barriers," Lebron said.

Balfour spoke of the fundamental "necessity of access to condoms, especially for young people. But condoms aren't the answer to AIDS. There is a lot more at stake. We must politicize the issue of AIDS and present the roots of the disease."

Here are some additional facts about women and AIDS:

- Women make up the fastest growing group being infected with the HIV virus. This is the case internationally, nationally and in the state of Massachusetts.
- From April 1989 to March 1991, the increase for female- diagnosed AIDS cases was 19 percent, while the increase in male AIDS cases rose 14 percent.
- Most of the women are poor, live in urban areas and 73 percent are women of color, 68 percent are between the age of 20 and 39.
- AIDS is the leading cause of death of African-American women of reproductive age in New York and New Jersey.
- Western Massachusetts may have the second highest percentage of women with AIDS in the country.
- There are no research projects which investigate female specific opportunistic infections to examine the course of HIV disease in women.

Professor says books downplay lesbianism

By WENDY JOHNSON
Collegian Correspondent

The nature of lesbian relationships in books is often downplayed by publishers, according to an Amherst College professor who used a well-known lesbian love story to illustrate her point.

Professor Michelle Barale presented a lecture titled "Finding a Lesbian Text," at the weekly Brown Bag Lunch Series sponsored by the Program for Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Concerns last Thursday.

The text which Barale discussed was Radclyffe Hall's 1928 ill-fated love story The Well of Loneliness, and how the novel's cover has changed over the past few decades.

"Each cover," she said, "seems to be a coy attempt [by the heterosexual publishers] to tell us what lesbian culture is about. There's a 'heterosexuality' about each cover because its hard to portray and represent a lesbian."

Each of the book's covers has elicited a different perception of what the book, and presumably a lesbian relationship, is all about.

The first cover, which the book had until 1964, shows two women sitting by a fire. "There is no visible determining fact to represent [the two women] as anything other than friends," Barale said, "because the publishers had to worry about getting censored — they wanted to reach a broad audience."

The publishers were so worried, in fact, that the word "lesbian" didn't even appear on the first cover — only the inscription that it was a "strange love story of a girl who stood midway between the sexes."

The book's second cover came out in 1964 and is a drawing of two different-colored hands embracing each other in a handshake.

"The hands suggest sameness yet the two different colors suggest difference. The same-sex desire was coated as something familiar — as two different beings, two different colors, two different sexes," Barale said.

Barale suggested that the choice to use two colors was a reflection of the racial tensions and the civil rights demonstrations going on at the time.

What sold the book in 1964 was the focus on the "differences in the relationship" of the two protagonists.

In 1974, the cover to the book portrayed the two main characters as "butch/femme," terms used to characterize masculine and feminine roles taken on by some lesbians.

Barale pointed out that the publishers continued to market the book by pushing, "the masculine and feminine while still using bodies of the same sex."

Today the cover of the book shows a single woman dressed in a man's suit.

Barale argued that the publishing company seemed to think that the book could not be allowed to stand on its own as a lesbian novel — that every 20 years or so the image had to be changed so that the characters would be likable.

Students voting today for representatives

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

Undergraduates and graduate students will head to the polls for the next two days to elect a student trustee and undergrads will also elect a president of the Student Government Association.

Sophomore John Aronson, the SGA election coordinator, said he expects a good turnout for the election, noting the ballots contain two referendum questions in addition to the election choices.

"I hope for a high turnout," Aronson said, adding the election will be spanned over a two-day period in order to accommodate the larger number of voters, which now include graduate students.

Running for student trustee are Sylvan Co-president Christopher Moran and the current Trustee Kevin Newnan. Running for SGA President are Commuter Area Government President Jennifer Wood and Residential Student Association President Jeffrey Markuns.

Aronson said the first referendum regarded the reinstatement of the waivable fee for the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group. The group's waivable fee was removed from the semesterly tuition bills of undergraduates this summer through a bill passed by the State Legislature.

The MassPIRG fee was $4 per student, and if the referendum passes, this fee will continue to be the same amount.

The second referendum, said Aronson, also regards a waivable fee to cover the expenses of the campus ministries. The fee, if passed, will be $10 each semester.

Aronson said the religious institutions on campus which benefit from the waivable fee will be the Newman Center, the Roman Catholic center, Hillel House and Chabad House, the orthodox Jewish center.

Aronson said other two groups, the United Christian Foundation in Dickinson Hall and the Arc Episcopal Church on North Pleasant St. will also benefit from the $10 fee.

Students who live in the Central or Orchard Hill Residential Areas vote in Franklin Dining Commons. Sylvan and Northeast residents vote in Worcester D.C. Southwest South residents will vote in Berkshire D.C. and Southwest North voters will cast ballots in Hampden D.C.

Commuters vote in the Hatch and Greek Area students at the Newman Center. Graduates may vote on the Campus Center Concourse.

Voting on Tuesday and Wednesday will be from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. in all areas, with graduates voting from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. both days in the Campus Center.

Massachusetts Attorney General Scott Harschbarger discovered in recent months that legal wording in the December bill did not actually outlaw the negative check-off fee, but merely protected the positive check-off fee system, according to Hill. Now the funding issue is back in dispute, with an altered bill somewhere on the horizon.

"So many legislators didn't even know that it is voluntary for the students and that we are a student organization [on campus]," Hill said. "They didn't really know what they were signing."

She said some legislators are changing their stance on the bill now that they are realizing that students are not forced to pay the fee.

Sanbonmatsu said, "The fee is a superdemocratic funding mechanism. We do not coerce students to pay the fee — on the contrary, it is paid voluntarily.

"The majority of students who pay the fee demonstrate that there is support for us," she said.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist, and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Vote for Tsongas

The Board of Editors has decided to go with Paul Tsongas, the hometown candidate, for the Democratic primary. Until very recently, Tsongas was on the Massachusetts Board of Regents of Higher Education and that shows at least some commitment to public higher education.

But we would also like to point out that the support was not overwhelming and that Bill Clinton and Jerry Brown were brought up as potential alternatives.

There are no Democratic candidates that stand out in the field and the pickings are slim. Frankly, we are concerned about the Democratic Party's chances this year as it goes into battle with a fairly entrenched incumbent like President Bush.

Vote for Bush

We have decided to endorse President Bush in the Republican primary.

Although once again there was no great enthusiasm in supporting the President, his foreign affairs record the past four years places him above his challengers. The President has negotiated hostage releases, handled the breakup of the Soviet Union with skill and was the driving force behind Operation Desert Storm, which the vast majority of the Amercican people supported.

President Bush also pushed through Congress the largest public works project in history, the Highway Restoration Act, which will, hopefully, stimulate job growth in the near future.

The President's opponents Patrick Buchanan and David Duke both lack the experience or sanity to hold the office of President.

Vote for students

First of all, we'd like to emphasize how important it is that students participate in the student elections that are being held today and tomorrow. These are your elections and you should take advantage of them.

Besides elections for student trustee and student president, there are several referendum questions dealing with waivable fees. Waivable fees provide a steady income for important campus organizations that must be protected.

There has been a lot of activity in the Statehouse lately around the waivable fee and much of it has been aimed at getting rid of it. While none of it has proven effective yet, more legislation is on the way and the fee is in danger.

Students vote to decide what waivable fees will appear on their tuition bills and if any individual student doesn't want to pay the fee, they can choose to skip it. What could be more democratic than that?

The state legislature is trying to take that right away from students. Show up at the polls today or tomorrow and let your numbers give those who would fight for the fee the ammunition they're going to need.

Unsigned editorials represent the opinions of a majority of the Board of Editors.

Story more than a woman

Frequently I have been hearing many people say that Ellen Story won the Democratic vote for the State Representative seat for the Amherst/Pelham district through sympathy to her gender. Why is it when a man wins an election he is not called a "man's candidate" and we do not assume that he won because he is a man, but rather that he was qualified for the position? It is because men almost always win the elections. It has become accepted for a man to acquire political positions and unusual for a woman to even desire them. Naturally when a woman candidate beats out a man many of the people do not contribute her win to the fact that she is competent and qualified for the job, but rather that she is a woman and the people voted for her out of sympathy. Stacy Malone

Stacy Malone

It is necessary for women to be represented in the House of Representatives and the Senate. This is the most effective way for the women's voice to be heard, but we must not choose any woman to represent the women of our society. She must be qualified, competent and willing. She must also be the most qualified person for the job. If a male opponent is obviously better qualified for the position then he should be the one to carry the vote of the people. If it is the woman candidate that is the most qualified she should not be discriminated against because of her gender.

The United States is supposed to be a democracy and the Congress was constructed to represent the people. The people are not being represented, but the White male is. We should want to include the representation of all minorities in the U.S. Congress, but we should not do it out of sympathy. Our country's roots are that of many ethnic backgrounds, religions and individual characteristics, yet these minorities that make up the majority of our nation do not receive the representation they have earned as U.S. citizens. How do we expect to even come close to being a democracy if we are excluding the representation of women and other minority groups in Congress? We should support the election of minority groups into political offices along with other aspects of the community if they are qualified and competent. This should not be done out of sympathy, but to diversify our government, workplaces, communities and most importantly to represent.

I do not believe that Ellen Story stole a sympathy vote by being a woman. Rather, the people of the Amherst/Pelham district granted her the vote based on her qualifications. Yes, Ellen Story is a woman and a competent woman at that. I am sure she will help the advancement of women if she receives the position as our state representative, because she will be representing the common interests among women.

Let's not forget that Ellen Story is also a person. Just because she is a woman does not mean that she will only represent the women of the community, but she will be representing the people of the community. She is not just a "woman's candidate" like a man is not just a "man's candidate." Both candidates should be the "people's candidates," but it is to the advantage of the minority groups of this country to place people in Congress that represent their gender, races, religions and beliefs. The election of qualified women and other minority groups into political offices will be taking a step toward getting the voices of the people heard.

Ellen Story is a qualified woman who is running for the state representative seat for the Amherst/Pelham district. She has the democratic vote, because the people gave it to her. They gave it to her not because they suddenly felt sympathy for the years of oppression they have put women through, but because the people are realizing that people are people. She has appeared to be qualified to represent the people while she advances the opportunities for women.

Stacy Malone is a UMass student.

A message to the Undergrads

A brief message to the undergrads: On Feb. 28 the trustees reluctantly voted on a 4 percent increase. We can all thank Chancellor O'Brien for being so adamantly for this increase. I had the opportunity to speak with the chancellor on March 2, and I would like you to know what was discussed.

"Chancellor O'Brien, why did you urge the tuition increase and why did you use the graduate health fee waiver as an excuse?"

O'Brien: "You mean reason."

"Pardon me, reason for the increase?"

O'Brien: "Well, the money needs to come from somewhere. Besides you can look at it this way. Up until now, you have already had a free ride with the cheap labor provided by the graduates."

No, we have not had a free ride and the graduate health fee waiver is not being paid by the undergraduates. The issue here is O'Brien is not willing to challenge the state and willingly takes the easy way out. O'Brien does not think undergrads will him and make his actions accountable to us.

We are consumers and we need to start behaving that way. There are many students disillusioned with student empowerment — it is not a one-shot deal and we need to be persistent. On Friday, the Higher Education Coordinating Council will meet to approve the increase. We need to be there to let them know we do not approve. The GEO and GSS are providing transportation to Boston (FREE RIDE TO BOSTON). Four percent may not seem like a lot, but consider this is the fourth year in a row we have had increases, and word has it fee increases for April are in the workings. If you are interested come to the meeting tonight March 10 at 8:00 p.m., room 163 Campus Center to sign up and discuss future plans. If O'Brien will not fight for us, we will. All undergrads are urged to come.

So what is Ramadan, anyway?

Ramadan? What is that? Are you a Hindu? This is the response you get when you tell people that you are fasting for Ramadan. And that is because a lot of people don't even know what Islam is!

Ramadan began last Thursday, March 5. It is the ninth month in the lunar calendar and it is when Muslims begin their fasting. Fasting in Ramadan is obligatory; every adult Muslim, male or female, must do it. The fasting time begins shortly before dawn and ends at sunset. The way of fasting is to abstain from eating, drinking ("nothing may pass the lips") and sexual acts. One must have the intention to fast the following day of Ramadan. Fasting becomes invalidated if a person, during fasting hours, deliberately eats, drinks, smokes, vomits or lets any object pass through the throat. The elderly are exempted from Ramadan, however they should substitute each day they cannot fast by feeding a poor person for one day or paying him/her.

Ramadan has greater meaning than simply fasting. It involves a moral and social code and a commitment to charitable deeds. In the holy Quran, Allah mentioned that the result of fasting is only hunger and thirst if one does not keep his hands from evil deeds or worse during Ramadan.

The month, therefore, becomes a period of meditation and prayer during which Muslims tend to withdraw a little from their usual daily affairs to spend long periods of time in the mosque. Those devotions are in addition to the five daily prayers which Muslims observe throughout the year.

This evening five of the world's best blues acts will come together live under one roof at Pearl St. in Northampton at 7 p.m. Alligator Records, the leading blues records label in the world, is sponsoring this 15-city blowout tour to celebrate its 20th anniversary with Koko Taylor and her Blues Machine, Elvin Bishop, The Lonnie Brooks Blues Band, Katie Webster, and Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials.

Bruce Iglauer, creator of Alligator Records explains, "Our goal is to expose new audiences to the emotional intensity of the blues. And the blues is never better than it is in live performance."

And this is one live performance not to be missed. The Grammy-award winning Queen of the Blues Koko Taylor and her band, The Blues Machine, as well as Elvin Bishop will present authentic, Chicago-style blues to the Pearl St. audience.

For a taste of Louisiana rock and funk, Lonnie Brooks and his super-tight road band will present their gigantic, soulful sound, as will Katie Webster, the "swamp boogie queen."

Finally, Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials, will use their unpredictable style and wild stage antics to close out what promises to be over three and a half hours of "Genuine Houserockin' Music."

Tickets are available at Pearl St. and Strawberries, and TicketPro.

Ballet twirls through FAC

Ballet Chicago
Fine Arts Center
March 6, 1992

Last Friday night at 8 p.m., we traveled with Ballet Chicago.

Ballet Chicago presented four exciting pieces of different styles: Square Dance, A Hairy Night on Bald Mountain, Time Torque, and By Django.

The first piece, Square Dance, brought us to a stage with a light blue background to match the dancers' pale blue costumes, which blended with the muted pink lights. Playful violin music by Arcangelo Corelli and Antonio Vivaldi gave us the feeling of being at a classical ballet transformed into a spring square dance.

Square Dance was about two dancers who meet at a dance. In the beginning, they are shy, but soon, they become one. First, the men did a dance, and then the women. The next two movements deal with all the dancers at the dance.

Behind all the happiness of Square Dance, though, the male dancer was saddened because he felt he lost the girl he had just met. In the beautiful third movement, he expressed his sadness with his powerful leaps. In the end, however, all is well.

A crash of thunder, a creak from the opening of a gate, and a cat's meow — then the beginning organ chords from the overture of Phantom of the Opera pounded across the stage. Where were we? A grave site on Bald Mountain.

We were invited to see the awakening of the dead in A Hairy Night on Bald Mountain. Done to the music of Moussorgsky's "A Night of Bald Mountain," we saw the zombies feast and dance wildly on a dark, foggy night.

"No! No! It's not how I want it!" the "director" screamed, coming out on stage in his canary yellow jacket and fire-engine-red glasses. "You! Do something with your hair!"

He pointed to a dancer and screamed "Music!" (this piece was hilarious). The mayhem continued on until Death appeared and put the dancers to sleep.

The dead awoke to "The Hall of the Mountain King," by Edvard Grieg. They formed a circle, clapping as each dancer did a solo. As they spun around wildly, Death stood in the background, walking back and forth like an angry parent. The zombies hit the floor when they noticed Death. With a snap of his fingers, they were dead.

Time Torque presented the theme of the force of metronome time in its three movements: "Walk over Time," "Samba Time," and "Xylo-Time." Through their wonderful incorporation of ballet and modern dance, the dancers presented much expression.

As we stepped out into the cold, crisp air, we could not believe that we were still at UMass.

Places, smells, feelings and rembrances

Different places have different smells. Living under a big, strong hand in China I could smell nothing but pressure, while Hong Kong is much more fun. It was sweaty and adventurous. The tropical fragrant of flowers and coconuts in Singapore and Malaysia made me dizzy, so it took me a little while for my nose to adjust the mild and plain atmosphere here in Amherst.

After four months in UMASS my nose began to be impatient. Therefore I packed up and started a smelly journey. Colorado smells like a big cheese: lazy, slow and relaxed, the typical Central American style, but it made me feel warm, especially when it was sixty degrees everyday in Christmas.

Then the smell of champagne, perfume, candy bars and fireworks came next. It was New Year's Eve in Boston. Marching on the streets with over-excited crowds, my friend Amy and I peeked into every fun place in Harvard Square, and through the huge windows of hotels and restaurants, we watched people having parties in luxurious manners for this big fiesta. It was disappointing but what I thought of then was the fairy tale "The Happy Prince" by Hans Anderson, and I looked up the sky hoping to find a finch. Probably I was too addicted to the stories.

If Eastern America is a cup of lemonade, then South America would be a bottle of Tequila, and I was drunk the first first time I tasted it. Traveling with 23 people from UMASS, we experienced the strong cultural difference in Mexico: the ancient, mythological ruins in Uxmal, Labna, Kohunlich and Chichen Itza, and the colonial and modern Merida, the stepdaughter of Spain. The extreme heat in the air and the passion in the explosive Spanish music drove me wild in those twelve days. What was more touching was the pure and intelligent Mexicans: the kids in a primary school, the old street cleaner who sang me a song, our humorous driver Alijandro and delightful guide Alfonso. They are beautiful, humble but with no shame.

Julia Chu

It was sad to say goodbye to Mexico and my colleagues. The cave adventure, the sunrise in Lagoon, the Tequila shot and beach volleyball match in Akumal Cancun, the last night in Merida and more will be permanent memories.

I like apples, and an apple as juicy and big as New York definitely suited my appetite. Although it stunk of money, the city beat made me feel at home. With only two butts in my pocket every day, I was tempted to travel from Long Island to Manhattan by myself, and was pretty much an expert at changing from buses to subways and to trains. After all, I still preferred my number 11 bus and shot as many interesting places as I could.

Outside Central Park I met an old Russian soldier selling gorgeous Russian medals and prints. He spoke broken English because he just arrived, but we had a happy chat and he addressed me as his "comrade" when we said goodbye.

Down the subway in Times Square I met a brilliant Brazilian musician playing guitar. He has been to the States for many years and owns a little coffee shop in Broadway. When asking him why he left Brazil, the hidden sadness in his eyes told me it must be a long story. He invited me to go to his coffee shop the next time I went to New York.

Contrary to him, there was a young and cheerful Yugoslavian artist selling paintings in the Soho District. He told me about his plan in the States in an energetic voice and I wished him good luck to his ambition.

On the way back to Amherst, I stopped by Connecticut and visited Yale University, a high-class but unapproachable Gothic town. Trumbull, where I stayed with my friend Kristin, is similar to Amherst, and that reminded me to come back to school.

My nose is really dizzy now after the smelly holiday. However I cannot wait for its recovery because I want to know the smell of the world.

The broken stereotype who broke my heart

After more than ten years of reform and opening to the outside world of mainland China, the stereotype of American guys as playboys still exists. I remember when I was in Beijing International Airport just about to ready to come to the United States — my ex-boyfriend's last words to me were:

"Don't trust any American guy!"

I received a serious culture shock after I came to this land. I never thought that someday I may fall in love with any American guy.

I met him, an American guy, at the graduate lounge in the Campus Center last semester. We started going out as friends, and he was very knowledgeable, nice and polite. We talked about history, culture and political issues. He changed all the negative images of American guys in my mind. I feel we have so much to share, so much to learn from each other. Three months passed and I realized I was in love!

I wanted to be fair, I wanted him to love me too. But things were never that simple. Tears and sleepless night followed. But I know this feeling is not unusual for a young woman and I am strong enough to get over it.

Two days later I met him at "The Hatch".

"How do you feel?" he asked.

"Fine. How do you think? I'm going to die?" I joked.

"What? You are not serious, are you?" He looked at me in total confusion.

I was shocked at his reaction. He didn't even think I was joking. I suddenly realized I might be a stereotype in his mind. Madam Butterfly or Ms. Saigon? NO! I never think of sacrificing for any single mind in the world. That is such a sin against my one billion Chinese people! China is a developing country, just think about how much money she spends to produce a graduate student like me after seven years of free education in college. Where does this money come from? One million people's hard work.

I was brought up by my grandmother in a Chinese village during the Cultural Revolution when my parents didn't have the time to care about me. I know how hard life used to be. Chinese peasants contributed the best of their products to feed the intellectual, industrial workers on the army. Life was always hard but full of hope. They were and they are still striving to used their own hands to make any socialist motherland become rich and strong! How hard-working and unsophisticated people are! You may think they are naive, but I am indebted to them.

America is an individual society, but for me, something can never be individual. Life is more meaningful for me to remember the past, and to do my best in the future for the people I really love and deeply indebted.

Guatemalans find voice in Rigoberta Menchu

Rigoberta Menchú is a Quiché indigenous woman who has been engaged in an arduous struggle to defend the rights of the indigenous people, and all the oppressed, in Guatemala.

Menchú, like many indigenous Guatemalans, has suffered the atrocities that the oppressors commit against them as part of a system of discrimination. Many of her family members have been tortured and assassinated by the Guatemalan military.

Luisa Quintanilla

Menchú saw two of her brothers die due to the chronic malnutrition that is imposed on many indigenous peoples. Neither the system that oppressed her, nor her experience of oppression are unique to Guatemala — they are replicated in many Latin American countries. Her life story represents the appalling reality of life for the downtrodden of Latin America.

What makes her exceptional is her incredibly courageous struggle for the emancipation and self-determination of her people. Menchú did not learn Spanish until she was 20, tackling the colonial language in order to end the silence in which the indigenous people suffer.

She used the language not as a tool of assimilation, but as a weapon of empowerment. She believed that the only way to counter-attack an oppressive culture was through its own language. Non-Spanish speaking natives were often cheated and deceived through linguistic tricks and traps, in contracts by land-owners and "the system."

As she explained, "Siempre han dicho: pobres indios que no saben hablar: entonces muchos hablan por ellos; por eso me decidí a aprender el castellano." ("They have always said: poor Indians who don't know how to speak: so others speak for them; that's why I decided to learn Spanish.") Menchú taught herself, and other indigenous Guatemalans, the colonial language as a revolutionary action.

Menchú did not have any formal training in political ideology, but her life experience provided the basis for an ideology of change for basic justice. She became an activist, and opened the eyes of her people, giving them the tools to fight for their rights.

Menchú has expressed the realities that her people still suffer. She says that they lack a decent childhood, basic education and sufficient food. Menchú says that the oppression is so pervasive that even the animals of the rich participate, since they often train their dogs to reject and shun the indigenous people.

As a child, Menchú had feared growing up to become a woman. This experience is not exclusively hers, but comes naturally to anyone who knows the bitter life that awaits the oppressed.

Menchú renounced to the institutions of marriage and motherhood, because she didn't want to bring children into a world in which they would lack their basic human needs simply because of their ethnic origin.

Menchú personally experienced the exploitation and discrimination both of the system, and by the ladino population of Guatemala. She explains, "Lo que a nosotros los indígenas nos duele más es que nuestro traje lo ven bonito pero la persona que lo lleva es como si fuera nada." ("What hurts us (indigenous) the most is that our clothes are seen as beautiful, but those who wear them are considered worthless.")

But she, unlike some indigenous people who once they learn Spanish loose their culture, has pride in her culture and demands its recognition. In fact, Menchú can be seen as part of a new generation of cultural revolutionaries.

In her life and struggles, Rigoberta Menchú has demonstrated a series of profound truths and principles for struggle. She has understood and developed the principle that language is a weapon, and culture is a field of battle in the fight for human rights.

She has highlighted and embodied the central role of indigenous women in the struggle of their people for justice, and the necessity and viability of the family as a basic unit of social action.

Finally, she has shown people how to see their struggles for justice in the broadest possible context, moving beyond the personal and localized, always reaching out to others.

For example, at the age of 23, she chose to share her experiences with the broadest possible public through her powerful autobiography "Me Llamo (I,) Rigoberta Menchú," which has been translated into numerous languages including English.

As she has said, "Mi opción por la lucha no tiene límites ni espacio: sólo nosotros que llevamos nuestra causa en el corazón estamos dispuestos a correr todos los riesgos." ("My options in the struggle have no limits or boundaries: only those of us who carry our cause in our hearts are willing to take all the risks.")

Menchú is 33, lives in exile, and carries on the struggle for justice in Guatemala.

Women's basketball season review

Laurie Dondarski drives to the hoop past a George Washington defender in an regular season game earlier this season. Dondarski, a sophomore, has performed well at both guard spots this year.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The story remains the same: to advance to the second round of the Atlantic 10 Conference Championships, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team must do something it hasn't done in two years — it must beat a Conference opponent.

The statistics are ugly, but they don't lie, and the Minutewomen have not won an A-10 game in 35 straight games, dating back to the 1989-90 season. They will play Wednesday at 3:30 p.m. against No. 8 seed Duquesne.

The Minutewomen (4-23, 0-14 in the A-10), while finishing last for the third consecutive year, have shown tremendous improvement over last year's 0-27 squad. UMass has shown grit and gumption in achieving their limited success, and have been in nearly every game at halftime.

In most of the team's A-10 losses, it has simply been unable to keep up with its opponents in the second half due to lack of a bench. In a game against Rutgers at the Cage, the Lady Knights played 10 players in the first half alone while UMass only dressed nine players.

But the team has had its share of highlights also, beginning the season with a win against Saint Francis, 44-40. UMass was led by the play of Senior Jenny Moran, who gathered 13 points and 10 rebounds. The Minutewomen played well in the Red Flash Classic, beating the Cornell Red Flash 60-47.

UMass also had a 65-58 win versus Brooklyn at home, which was their first home win of the year, and a win against Northeastern under unusual circumstances.

The team was slated to play the Huskies on Jan. 4th, but most of the Minutewomen team came down with the flu. UMass scheduled the game later in January, and the team recovered nicely, winning 49-40. Kim Kristofik paced the team with 24 points and 14 rebounds in her best performance of the season.

Unfortunately, Conference play came upon Joanie O'Brien's team, and the Minutewomen hit a 13-game skid to end the season. The A-10 was strong, having both West Virginia and George Washington ranked in the Top 25 most of the year. In addition, Rutgers performed well in the Conference, finishing 18-9.

While O'Brien spent much of her first year building for the future, the 1991-92 UMass squad was filled with surprises.

Trish Riley, for example, was the biggest surprise for the team. Riley, who suffers from a chronic back injury, hardly even played last season.

The senior from Altoona, PA came back stronger than anyone ever expected, and finished the regular season with an average of 9.1 points and 2.6 assists per game. Riley has played despite her pain through most of the season, and is truly the catalyst for UMass.

Jenny Moran has been another pleasant surprise for the Minutewomen, bouncing back from a poor 1990-91 season to place second on the team with 12.1 ppg and 5.7 rpg, and become the Minutewomen's outside threat. Moran is currently third on the UMass career 3-pointer list.

Kim Kristofik nearly doubled her scoring output from last year while adjusting to a new position. Kristofik led the team in both points and rebounds with 12.6 and 7.2, respectively. The junior moved back to center after playing forward last season.

Walk-on sophomore Laurie Dondarski has performed well this year in both guard positions, as she has contributed to the offensive flow and shown improvement through the course of the year. Maleeka Valentine has been a solid all-around player for the Minutewomen, shutting down some of the toughest players in the Conference on defense.

defense did the rest.

"UMass executed its offense very well," said Rhode Island coach Al Skinner. "They got the ball into the hands of people we didn't want it in."

Rhode Island trailed 56-55 before freshman Jason Alexander (13 points, 6 assists) caught fire. Alexander, who threw some pretty seeing-eyed passes, hit four free throws and picked Jim McCoy's pocket, leading to an easy layup, which gave the Rams a 61-58 lead.

"I did a bad job coaching tonight," said UMass coach John Calipari. "I didn't start coaching until about 5 minutes left in the game. I didn't think the effort was there tonight. We were just screwing ourselves up."

The Rams (20-9) came out of the locker room for the second half trailing 32-27, but within 4:27, they tied the game and with 12:34 remaining took a two-point lead (46-44).

The Minutemen opened a 10-point lead with 18:41 left in the game and it looked as if they would cruise to a fairly easy win. But that was not the case.

Alexander hit a trey and found Andre Samuel (18 points) all alone for an easy layup, and Jeff Kent nailed a short jumper to get the Rams within three (37-34).

Williams made one free throw to push UMass' lead back up to four. However, Samuel's two foul shots and Alexander's layup tied the game at 38.

The lead switched hands eight times the rest of the way before the Minutemen ran off 15 straight points to put URI away.

"Every time the other team makes a run, we try to counter with a run of our own," Herndon said.

In the first half, UMass opened up a quick 13-6 lead on the strength of two Tony Barbee (10 points) field goals (one a trey), and two Jim McCoy buckets.

The lead ballooned to 18-8 with 13:46 remaining, then the Minutemen slowed the tempo down. UMass, which ran so effectively against Rutgers in the quarterfinals Sunday, started last night's game the same way — running.

But, when UMass slowed down, it got sloppy on offense and the Rams climbed back into the game. Abdul Fox hit two consecutive jumpers and Kyle Ivey-Jones made two free throws to get Rhode Island within four (18-14).

A Barbee eight-footer and three-pointer pushed the lead up to 9, and Anton Brown made it 12, on the next possesion, burying a jumper from someplace in Pittsburgh.

UMass will host West Virginia, which beat Temple 44-41 in the first-ever A-10 final at the Cage.

Harper Williams slips between Rutgers' Chuck Weiler and Mike Jones in the Minutemen's 106-94 Atlantic 10 quarterfinal win over the Scarlet Knights Sunday. The junior center was named the 1992 Atlantic-10 Player of the Year. Williams was the game's high scorer with 20 points, and chipped in with 7 rebounds, 4 assists and 1 blocked shot. "Harper Williams took us to the championship game," said UMass head coach John Calipari.

Player of the game

University of Massachusetts forward Harper Williams scored eight points and grabbed two rebounds in the final four minutes to give UMass its 27th win of the season. Williams paced UMass for the game with 20 points while adding seven rebounds, four assists and one blocked shot. "Harper Williams took us to the championship game," said UMass coach John Calipari.

Why UMass won

Just as the Minutemen looked as if they were going to falter, falling behind by three (61-58) with 5:19 left in the game, the Minutemen went on a 15-0 run and never looked back. UMass held Rhode Island to 38.4 percent shooting for the game, including 28.6 percent in the first half, giving UMass a 32-27 advantage at the intermission. UMass proved stronger on the boards, outrebounding the Rams by eight in the second half and 12 for the contest.

A blast of the past from the gym

PHILADELPHIA — I didn't think much of it until I shuffled in my seat and got a splinter in my rear — the Palestra on the campus of the University of Pennsylvania is more than just the host site of the Atlantic 10 tournament. . .

Sweat actually smells good here. . . and it's supposed to.

It's not an arena, a stadium or a "sports complex". . . it's a gymnasium.

The building constantly echoes the sounds of an inflated ball off its hardwood floors and reverberates the squeaks of sneakers off its steel girders overhead.

The sun peeking through the windows in the ceiling gives you a good excuse for missing the easy five-foot jumper.

Ticket information

Tickets for Thursday's Atlantic 10 final at the Curry Hicks Cage against West Virginia (9 p.m., ESPN) will be available at the Cage at 8:30 a.m. today.

Each student with a valid UMass ID may buy a ticket for a reserved seat for $5 with a two-ticket limit per student.

Basketballs that swish through the net can be heard from any of the "not a bad" seats in the house.

"Fresh Fruit Frostees" and "Fresh Lemonade" replace three-day old hot dogs in the concession stands.

Blinking neon lights don't show you your way, painted arrows on dilapidated brick do.

Yeah, there are Coors Light, Pepsi and Dunkin' Donuts signs hanging from and surrounding the scoreboards, but they're hard to see behind the "LaSalle 1954 NCAA Champions," "Villanova 1985 NCAA Champions" and Ivy League banners.

The floor is painted red, white and blue. No neon greens or yellows here.

The Palestra's box office is just that, a five-by-five box with a gentleman inside who is prepared to tell you about the 1935 Ivy League Championship team if you even look like you are curious.

Half your energy is expired before you even get into the building, as the big wooden doors heed one's progress.

Once in, you are greeted by the arches overhead and "programs heeerrre."

As I sit in the media area, I feel like I should be using a manual typewriter, not a computer, and adjusting my hat with a "press" placard in it.

Practice baskets aren't electronically directed up and down from the ceiling, but are nailed to the outer walls of the structure.

It's easy to get caught up in the aura. I was hesitant to ask about the whereabouts of a fax machine, ridiculously thinking they might not have one.

But, I forgot, the Palestra isn't familiar with "March Madness," just basketball.

Tsongas easily wins in Mass. primary

Bush logs solid victory over Buchanan

by DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON - Democrat Paul Tsongas won his home state's presidential primary decisively yesterday, while President Bush handily defeated conservative commentator Patrick Buchanan in the GOP contest in Massachusetts.

While both wins were expected, Buchanan appeared to have failed to to match his New Hampshire results, where he came close to 40 percent of the vote.

"I would guess Buchanan would have to be a bit disappointed in this Massachusetts showing. I think he expected to do better than this, not to upset the president but to do better than this," said Paul Wantanabe, a political scientist at the University of Massachusetts.

Ron Kaufman, Bush's political director, was pleased with the outcome.

"As a matter of fact, I thought it would be worse than it was," Kaufman said, referring to the size of the Buchanan vote. Gov. William F. Weld, a Bush supporter, termed the president's Massachusetts victory as "adequate."

Wantanabe said the Democratic results were expected. Tsongas ran strongly in the Northeast, while Clinton carried the seven southern states that had primaries Tuesday.

Tsongas said repeatedly that he was the candidate who could win on neutral ground and that he would be the strongest candidate against Bush.

"To all of those people in the Democratic Party who are resisting change, get out of the way; the American people are coming," he said.

With 492 of 2,139 precincts, 23 percent, reporting in the Democratic race, Tsongas had 95,487 votes, or 67 percent. Brown was second with 20,276 votes, or 14 percent. Clinton was third with 15,796 votes, or 11 percent. No preference had 2,419 votes, or 2 percent.

With 465 of the state's 2,139 precincts reporting, or 22 percent, Bush had 29,534 votes to 12,665 for Buchanan, or 66 percent to 28 percent. Former Ku Klux Klansman David Duke trailed at 2 percent, or 1,052 votes. No preference picked up 1,734 votes, or 4 percent.

Democratic candidates had conceded the winner's slot to Tsongas, a Lowell native who is a former U.S. senator from Massachusetts. Among other candidates, Ralph Nader, the consumer advocate, had 6,290 votes, or 5 percent, in early returns.

Also on the ballot, but failing to mount any challenge, were former Irvine, Calif., Mayor Larry Agran; Sens. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska and Tom Harkin of Iowa, who dropped out of the race; Lyndon LaRouche; and nostalgia candidate Eugene McCarthy.

The latest voter registration totals, released Monday by the secretary of state, showed there were 1.26 million registered Democrats, or 40.35 percent; 425,444 Republicans, or 13.5 percent; and 1.4 million unaffiliated, or 46 percent. Unaffiliated voters may pick any primary.

Bush was born in the the Boston suburb of Milton and is strongly supported by the state's Republican establishment, including Gov. William F. Weld. But Buchanan made a final weekend campaign swing into the state.

Although the president did not campaign in Massachusetts himself, he sent a stream of surrogates in the final days, including Vice President Dan Quayle.

Group plans trip to fight tuition raise

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

Only five students turned out for an undergraduate meeting last night concerning the latest tuition hike proposed by the Board of Trustees.

At the meeting in the Campus Center, the goal was to sign undergraduates up for a bus trip to Boston this Friday to attend a meeting of the Higher Education Coordinating Council. The council will be voting on the proposed 4 percent tuition increase.

"This was organized so last minute," said Marjorie Decker, a STPEC and women's studies major who arranged the meeting. "I'd be happy if ten people had showed up tonight, but the important thing is to get them on the bus Friday."

On Friday, Feb. 28 the University Board of Trustees voted to raise tuition by 4 percent for next fall. The proposed increase must be voted on by HECC for implementation.

The Graduate Employee Organization and the Graduate Student Senate have arranged to bus both graduates and undergraduates to this Friday's meeting to provide a student presence and to speak to council members about their concerns.

Graduate Student Senate President Mark Kenen said, "Only about 1,000 graduates pay tuition, but we still have to fight [the increase]."

"We want to provide support and encouragement and mobilize the undergraduates to fight for themselves," he added.

Tuition has risen an average of 7.5 percent per year since 1965, when the tuition was $200 for in-state and $600 for out-of-state undergraduates. The current tuition is $2,052 for in-state and $7,920 for out-of-state undergraduates.

If the four percent increase is approved, in-state tuition will rise to $2,134 and out-of-state to $8,237.

The increase is comparatively not as high as previous years, but many are concerned that yearly increases take pressure off the state to provide adequate funding.

Throng mobs Cage for tickets

Concerned about safety, UMass considering lottery

By GAYLE LONG
Collegian Staff

After the ESPN midnight game last February when four students were taken to University Health Services after suffering from hyperventilation and heat exhaustion outside of the student entrance at the Curry Hicks Cage, the Athletic Department's Ticket Office decided there had to be another way to distribute tickets.

Unfortunately, the system they implemented — distributing tickets outside of the Cage two days prior to the game — now also seems precarious. Yesterday morning, a mob of student fans knocked over safety barricades and condensed in a 'claustrophobic nightmare,' despite the presence of police and mounted officers.

News Analysis

Yesterday, the Athletic Department handed out 2,200 tickets for the Atlantic 10 Finals, due to take place at Curry Hicks Cage on Thursday at 9 p.m.

Students began waiting outside before the A-10 semifinal game against Rhode Island — some 300 miles away — even took place. This A-10 Final game is the second appearance in three years for the Minutemen.

Chief Jack Luippold of the Department of Public Safety said his department and the Athletic Department are working on alternative ways to give out the student tickets.

"I'd like to think there is a way to give out the tickets and alleviate the problems we've been having," said Luippold, who said he is looking for suggestions for other methods.

Athletic Ticket Manager Thorr Bjorn said some options such as a lottery system could be on the agenda for next year.

"We could implement a lottery system for four or five games at a time," Bjorn said, referring to the NCAA lottery which publishes applications in the area newspapers for people to send in, along with a check or money order.

However, Bjorn said students paying to see basketball games is not going to happen. "Paying is not even an issue," he said. He also noted that other large public universities such as UConn charge students admission to basketball games.

In addition, Bjorn said he was concerned about the safety factor. He said some of the students approached him with complaints after they had received their tickets.

"About 75 to 80 percent of the students were happy once they got their tickets, but I did talk with some students today about their concerns," he said. "I got some good ideas from them.

"But no matter what, everyone won't be happy," he said.

University spokesperson Karin Sherbin said the UMass police had been on duty at the Cage since late Tuesday night.

"Chief Luippold said that at 11:30 p.m., when students started to line up outside of Curry Hicks, officers were assigned to the area," Sherbin said, adding that there were no reports of injury at Health Services.

According to Bjorn, some 700 students waited in a line at 7 a.m. Tuesday morning.

The line spanned from the ticket window of the Curry Hicks Cage towards the Herter Hall side of the old Curry Hicks, past Bartlett Hall and ended near Goddell Hall.

At 7:30 a.m., an employee entered the Ticket Office, causing a mad rush of students towards the doors — most likely because the Ticket Office has been known to give out tickets early (sometimes up to five hours early).

This rush caused the impatient crowd to sprint forward, with some of those who had waited overnight — carrying pillows, sleeping bags and knapsacks — left behind by newer arrivals with a lighter load.

Others left their belongings behind for their piece of what could be UMass' first NCAA berth, scattering

After roof falls, woman has baby

MILLVALE, Pa. (AP) — A bank manager gave birth to a son about 11 hours after the bank's roof crashed down on her and eight others.

"I guess the shock kind of woke the baby up and he said, 'It's my time,'" said Alex P. Kline, Sr., the father. He said his wife, Ellen Kline, and the baby, Alex Jr., were doing well.

Police in the Pittsburgh suburb of Millvale blamed the Monday morning collapse on rainwater that had built up over the weekend.

"There had to be a drainage problem," said Millvale Police Chief Robert Dugan.

All of the injured were treated at hospitals and released, except for Mrs. Kline, who remained at the hospital and gave birth late in the day.

Two Trump resorts file for bankruptcy

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. (AP) — Two of Donald Trump's financially troubled casinos filed for bankruptcy to restructure $538 million in debt.

Trump Castle Casino Resort and Trump Plaza Hotel and Casino filed for protection from creditors Monday in pre-packaged Chapter 11 bankruptcies, already approved by at least two-thirds of each casino's bondholders.

The advance creditor approval averts a long and costly stint in U.S. Bankruptcy Court.

Under the Castle plan, Trump would give bondholders half the casino's equity in exchange for lower interest rates on $288 million in bonds.

The Trump Plaza plan restructures $250 million in debt but doesn't relinquish any equity because the casino isn't in default. Trump has missed two interest payments to Castle bondholders.

UMass women feel shortchanged by high school

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

There are disproportionately fewer women than men studying math and science at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst which could be a result of women's high school experiences, according to a report released recently by the American Association of University Women, .

Entitled "How Schools Shortchange Girls," the report said girls receive significantly less attention than boys from their high school teachers and are less likely to be encouraged to pursue a career in math and science.

The report also said the contributions and experiences of girls and women are still marginalized or ignored in many of the textbooks used in U.S. public schools.

AAUW Educational Foundation President Alice McKee wrote in the report that society is not addressing the effects of these inequities.

"Women and children are swelling the ranks of the poor, at great cost to society," she said. "Yet our education policymakers are failing to address the relationship between education and the cycle of poverty."

The report includes information provided by the U.S. Department of Education which links the disparity between the numbers of men and women studying math with the severe earning differences between the sexes.

The statistics state women with five or more years of college education make only 69 cents for every dollar earned by men with an equal number of years of education. But wage differentials favoring men are considerably less or disappear altogether for women in their early 30s who have earned eight or more mathematics college credits.

Echoing the national study, many female students at the University agree they have been shortchanged by their high schools and did not receive the same quality of education as men.

"I remember one teacher saying you're just going to get married anyway to another student," said junior nursing major Susan Giumetti on her high school experiences.

Lisa Smith, also a junior nursing major, said she experienced bias and remembers her high school business math class teacher saying "businessman."

"He only taught class to the males," Smith said.

Assistant Dean of Undergraduate Affairs and director of the Women in Engineering Program, Dr. Nancy Bottone Hellman, acknowledges the low numbers of women in the engineering department.

"I think that the messages given out in elementary and high school are different about the abilities of girls and boys," she said.

Hellman considers both women teachers' relationship with math and science and society's attitude toward women who go into these fields as factors contributing to the low numbers of women studying engineering.

"Most children are taught by women teachers who are not comfortable with math and science themselves, and society is not comfortable with the idea [of women working in the math and science fields]," she explained. "Teenage girls and young women need additional encouragement and aren't getting it."

Computer engineering major Joanne Gray remembers her fifth grade science class where her teacher would have the boys run the projector and the girls were assigned to write letters. "There was a lot of discrimination and a lack of encouragement," said Gray.

Examining the technology of toys given to little boys, Gray said the socialization of men and women starts very early.

"Boys get the train sets and girls get the dolls," Gray said. "Boys are encouraged more in computers and video games and so many games are based on aggression against the girls, or they show a male hero rescuing the scantily clad girl from the villain which disillusions young girls.

"We have a long way to go," concluded Gray.

Also, the report notes that girls and boys enter school roughly equal in measured ability. But twelve years later, girls have fallen behind their male classmates in key areas such as higher-level mathematics and self-esteem.

Sister Jeanette Corneau, a professor in the nursing department and a counselor who deals with issues of self-esteem, agrees the problem originates in childhood though she said schools are not the only source of the problem.

"Kids hear destructive comments so young," she said. "It's a generational problem in the home as well as the classroom and the cycle has to be broken."

Joanne Gray recalls sitting in one of her classes asking herself, "Damn, why am I here alone? Why am I one of the only women here?"

Gray is one of four women enrolled in computer engineering as a major here at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, according to the Registrar's office. There is a total of 79 students in UMass' computer engineering program.

"It can be overwhelming to be a woman in classes with all men," Gray said. "You're just so isolated. There is a lot of pressure and focus on you. You're taking a risk."

Gray is also one of many UMass women who feel they were generally shortchanged by their high school experience and that it has followed them to university life.

Their experiences support the findings of a report released last month by the American Association of University Women which states that female students face a bias in U.S. high schools which affects their future career goals and college lives.

The report says it is this bias that steers women away from math and science and corners them instead in the liberal arts.

"When someone says 'engineer' the first image is a man. You have to say 'woman engineer' when referring to a female," said Gray.

"Women shouldn't get discouraged," she said. "If the material is difficult, it's because it is difficult. Yes, [engineering] is really hard, and even harder being a woman.

"One of the most important things a woman who's interested in math and science can have is a mentor," Gray said. "There are no role models — the professors are all men."

Being the sole woman in one of her labs and in one of her classes, senior engineering major Julie Rodrigues said she initially felt a little uncomfortable. Though Rodrigues said she didn't have "any trouble" once she got to know her male colleagues, she expects to be discriminated against once she enters the "real world."

"Although I think the male students have no reason to discriminate, sometimes you get it from the professors," said senior industrial engineering major Amy Silverman.

Silverman, president of the UMass chapter of the Society of Women Engineers, a national organization that encourages women to consider careers in engineering, says her organization is supportive.

"We give students a chance to feel like they're not the only women in the program," Silverman said. "We offer workshops that branch out and do networking to get students to meet people and expand their knowledge.

Dr. Nancy Bottone Hellman, assistant dean of Undergraduate Affairs and director of the Women in Engineering Program, said "students need to take courage and let us help them. They need to be willing to be involved in helping themselves by being assertive about seeking support because there's a great deal of support for them."

One of the only two female faculty members in the Physics department, Jennie Traschen did not encounter sexism until she started her graduate work at Harvard.

"I felt excluded," she said. "There's a proving period that girls have that took a couple years to go through. People talk down to you."

Traschen, who says she loves teaching undergraduates, said she has found that some men tend to be less respectful of her as a professor.

"Respect is a problem for some of the male students," she said. "If you're a woman professor, you are blamed if a student doesn't understand something, despite your expertise."

futons, wool blankets and a number of pup tents along the 'ticket path,' leaving plenty to be cleaned up afterward.

While the crowd compacted itself into a dense throng from the old Curry Hicks building to the ticket window, Amherst Town firefighters arrived to put out three trashcan fires set by the fans to keep warm during their die-hard vigil.

When the crowd approached the front of Curry Hicks, the line was narrowed by incandescent yellow work horses used as a barricade for the crowd. However, instead of the line becoming more orderly, they made the people at the back more anxious — and pushed the mass of students even tighter.

Students yelled to police officers to rectify the situation, yet there seemed little they could do to maintain an orderly line. The students then became abrasive to some of the officers, yelling obscenities, which only added to the chaos.

When the first tickets were given out, there was more pushing, forcing smaller people outside of the barricades and others, suffering from being crushed or trampled, managed to get out of the throng.

Bjorn mentioned the 'crowd mentality,' in which fear plays a major role. "People are always saying that someone else is pushing them," Bjorn said. "Hopefully, we can work positively to fix the situation."

Angry middle schoolers stage sit-in over cuts

By MAURA GRIFFIN
Associated Press

MONTPELIER, Vt. — The kids at Montpelier's middle school experienced some 1960's history on Tuesday when they staged a spontaneous protest over the loss of a program.

"We're really angry because we weren't consulted on this," said Kathryn Hibbert, 11, about the Montpelier School Board's decision to cut the industrial arts program in the city schools. "Nobody asked us what we wanted."

About $100,00 from the wood and metal shop budget at the middle and high schools was shifted by the board Monday to a computer-based technology program.

The students found out about it Tuesday morning in their homerooms, and some immediately started drafting students to protest.

"I heard about it and went around to the first-period classes and told the kids to stop sitting in the classrooms," said Crystal Utton, 13, a Main Street Middle School student.

"We were all in the hallways at first, then it was too big and we came into the gym."

Most of the school's 440 kids were in the gym, sitting on the floor and listening to student speakers. Dozens of children waited in line to use the microphone to vent their anger at the loss of the program and to express their affection for the teacher, Bill Croney.

"Making things in wood shop gives me self-confidence because of the hands-on learning," Kelly Blodgett, 14, said. "I can take it home and be proud of it."

Some students brought homework into the gym. Some used the floor as an easel to make billboards with slogans such as "Save Industrial Arts and Mr. Croney," and "Mr. Croney for President."

Croney, who has taught industrial arts at the school for 19 years, said the protest began in response to his firing, but evolved into a struggle for empowerment.

"Suddenly I'm out of here in June. This fell on the kids' heads without much input," he said. "This protest has made the hardest day of my 19 years here more bearable."

The school board has been studying the technology program for several months. "We have concluded that the industrial arts strategies cannot prepare our students for the Information Age," the plan said.

"Even students in traditional manufacturing fields will be asked to perform tasks by thinking creatively, using computerized equipment."

At least two students at the rally were trying to convince others of the advantages of the computer program.

"Montpelier is way behind in technology," said Jascha Franklin-Hodge, 12. "Kids think that computers are isolated ways to type your homework.

By the time we get into the job market, we will be at a big disadvantage if we don't have computer skills."

Michael MacIntyre, a photojournalist-to-be who was toting a camera and equipment bag and wearing a camouflage hat, agreed that a computer program was the better program.

What is a Textbook Buyback?

Three times during each semester the Textbook Annex brings in a wholesaler to buy textbooks from students. Wholesalers are in the business of selling used books to colleges and universities across the country. Therefore, in determining how much they will pay a student for a book they must consider the demand for that book as well as the shipping and handling costs involved in processing and reselling the book. This is why prices vary and indeed change frequently.

The best time to sell books is at the end of the semester. At that time the Annex will pay 50% of the new price for a book if we have an order for that book for the following semester. If we do not, the wholesaler may make you an offer.

If you have questions please ask the people doing the buyback or the Annex staff. They will be more than happy to answer your questions and give you any tips that may be applicable to your situation.

When is the next Textbook Buyback?

at the Textbook Annex:

Wed., March 11, 9:00 am-4:00 pm
Thurs., March 12, 9:00 am-4:00 pm
Fri., March 13, 9:00 am-2:00 pm

The end of the semester buyback will be held in May.

Artists, comedians run rampant in the dining commons

As I stand in the dishroom watching the trays slowly make their way down the line, I notice something with a strong artistic quality. Although this sculpture does possess a great deal of imagination, it is not a sight unknown to my eyes.

As it comes closer and closer I examine the exhibit. In each of the four corners of the tray a glass is placed in order that another golden tray can be placed securely on top. For some of the daring artists there is even a third tray. What brilliance I say to myself. This monstrosity was obviously created by someone with a lot of maturity and spare time.

I delightfully and patiently begin to remove the glasses from the trays. I discover that one glass is nicely filled with the meal being served that same evening.

Another glass has been placed upside down on the tray with fluid still inside. Fascinated by this, I pull the glass up watching the strange discolored liquid fill the tray. Unchallenged by any of this, I notice on the next tray is not one, not two, but three glasses, tightly fastened together.

Unable to separate these glasses without them breaking and injuring my hands, which would result in an early release from my job, I discard the glasses, in hope that another combination just like it will come again.

As I walk out of the kitchen in awe, I start to clean the tables. I pick up the pepper shaker and notice the pepper pouring out due to a gaint gash. This incision seems to be made by a sharp utensil, perhaps a knife. As I happily clean up the pepper I think to myself, "What intelligence."

Manejah Morad

To actually think to make a hole in the pepper shaker so that the innocent victim, who only wanted a touch of pepper, will instead ruin their food with a large size portion. How funny that would be. My only disappointment is that I probably would never see this event actually take place since I spend my time in the dishroom. Instead, I just stand there and imagine the incident in my head. How funny.

The invention of a cafeteria or as UMass may call it, the dining common, is one which has proven to be very beneficial to the majority of UMass students. Where else can you go to get a full course meal already made for you. As well as an opportunity to go back for seconds or thirds or until you become so full or sick you can't seem to get up.

For some, the dining commons is the social highlight of their day. A time to get all dressed up in hopes to meet that special someone.

For the amount of importance this dining common seems to be, I don't understand why there seems to be a constant lack of respect.

One may ask how can you disrespect a dining common? Well it doesn't take an engineer to figure out that with any of the artistic skills that I have confronted there is a certain failure to respect, not only the dining common but the full-time staff and students who work there to fill your stomach.

I often think to myself how difficult it could possibly be just to eat and leave without any of this immature amusement.

After all this protesting I am confident that my anger or anyone else's will not result in anything positively significant, but since this is UMass I thought it was my duty to say something about it.

Finally, to leave on a good note, don't worry if we've closed and your not done talking. We'll wait. We've got nothing else to do, we're only students, too.

UMass hoop fans get ripped off

Hey sports fans! It is now 8:30 AM on Tuesday and I've just come from Curry Hicks Cage where I'd hoped to get a ticket to Thursday night's A-10 Conference Championship Game. I had hoped to get one because I got up at 4:00 (an hour I thought only existed in the afternoon) and sat in from of Goodell in the cold. Even then, when I got in line, I thought I had arrived too late because hundreds of UMass basketball fans had already assembled. I didn't even mind waiting. The line of people was peaceful and friendly. It was almost like Add/Drop. Students wrapped in blankets and sleeping bags chatted about how they couldn't wait to see the game, how early they had gotten in line, and how many tests they had today. It was one of those "crazy college nights" that are remembered so vividly in future years.

Once morning came, though, this camaraderie turned a bit sour. The cold morning air and lack of sleep left some of the students a bit edgy about their chances to get a ticket, but most were still content to wait it out and see.

Then, at 7:45, it happened. All of our worst fears were confirmed. Some movement at the front of the crowd led to a stampede from the rear. I was shocked and dismayed to see the whole end of the line rush past my spot. This forward movement led all the students to panic. Everyone charged the front of the line, leaving behind their pillows, chairs and even radios. An almost single file line that had stretched from the entrance of the Cage to the end of Goodell now was herded ten deep on the side of Curry Hicks. I was at the end, of course. I was too stunned to fight for a place in the stampede. I felt angry at the students for callously disregarding my line position and the rights of their fellow students.

At first, I blamed the students. I can't believe how selfish everyone was. We were all in line and agreeing that those who waited longest (some from 9:30 PM!) would get tickets first. But the moment people started moving, it was "survival of the fastest." I am truly disgusted at the lack of consideration shown. I don't even care if I see the game now. But then I realized who has to share the blame for this ugly incident: the UMass athletic department. Why didn't they have the foresight to see that this would happen and do something to prevent it? How about something simple, like handing out numbered tickets or wristbands? They can be purchased cheaply and given out by volunteers from the athletic department. It is totally ludicrous to expect students who have been in line all night not to rush to the front if there is nothing guaranteeing their place in line.

It is senseless that this stampede had to occur. I waited for four hours for tickets I should have gotten. But, due to the lack of foresight by a few and the selfishness of many, I guess I'll go uptown to watch the game.

Your free clip and save guide to hitchhiking etiquette

It's Sunday morning in Northampton. A handful of students and locals are hovering together by the post office bus stop, a freezing, tooth-chattering bulk, leaning towards one another for warmth but avoiding eye contact. We're talking about bitter, violent cold — a classic New England February. The bus is late for a change.

But Lo! What's this? A few feet away from the bus stop stands another soul, stomach in, thumb out. Before long, a car slows and pulls up beside the hitchhiker. O happy day! O happy valley, with its happy, good natured populous! 'Sometimes it's beautiful not to live in the real world,' he thinks, hopping into the front seat.

The driver is a very large woman with very big hair — they're both going to UMass. Silence, awkward for the driver, heavenly for the rider, fills the auto. At last, she breaks it by snapping in a cassette — "Bob Seger," she explains, "Ya like 'im? Ya like Bob Seger?" "Yeah," the passenger answers, turning to his savior amiably, "I think he's real cool."

That was me. I was that hitchhiker.

Having lived in urbania all my life, I was always advised, warned and just plain harassed by all my superiors not to ever dream of thumbing a ride. Tales of psychopaths I was told, and of babbling, perverted religious freaks; of desperate men and women with needles in their arms and sour milk on their breaths.

I'd be the first to admit that there are plenty of buggin' out people across this vast land, but I have uncovered a few places where hitchhiking is not uncommon and relatively safe.

This place returns to mind for a moment. Like I said, most people are extremely trusting here and with good reason: this is the Happy Valley! When you live in a large community, both rural and urban in a way, where a huge majority of its inhabitants are either students or teachers (or people closely related to either), a certain trust develops. Cars pull over before you get a chance to grow bitter. So go ahead, thumb a ride. Or don't

Ari Vais

— I'd hate to have it on my conscience if something happened to you.

Parts of Europe are terrific for free travel of this variety. A partner and I once hitched, on a whim, from Norwich to Brighton in England and it took us an afternoon. Norwich is a good two hours northeast of London and crazy Brighton is a southern beach town — not a bad ride.

In American distance, we didn't go much further than from Boston to New York, but I wouldn't recommend being a hitchhiker on the island of Manhattan: you'll never get picked up and if you do, you'll probably never be heard from again.

In general, thumbing rides is generally safer for the driver and the hitcher in Europe than it is here.

No matter what part of the world you choose to protrude your thumb and take your chances, here are some tips you should cut out and refer to for the next time you find yourself travelling the "cool" way.

Never be overly friendly to perfect strangers — at least not in this instance. Do not smile at or wave to oncoming cars — they will not pick you up (some, however, may swerve to hit you).

Never put your thumb down while there are oncoming cars in view. You don't want to look like you don't care. . . one of those cars could be your ticket.

Always look pathetic. Do not wail or look desperate, just miserable, pitiful — you are cold and very humble.

Always try to appear like a student. If you look like you're seeking a degree, people will stop for you under the assumption that you have too much going for you to throw it all away by hacking them up.

Watch what you're wearing. Once I was hitchhiking to UMass and having no luck at all. Suddenly, I remembered the Raiders cap on my head (with its notorious associations to L.A. gangs), hastily removed it, and almost instantly got a ride.

Never alarm the driver in any way. Appear peaceful, grateful. Speak, but enjoy the silence if she happens to linger. Don't talk the driver's ear off under any circumstances — it may be disarming, but it will surely be grating. This person just let you in on their privacy — why invade it more? On the other hand, don't ignore the driver if spoken to. They will automatically assume the worst and may act irrationally.

Always keep your cool if a car blows by you at an ugly speed. Whipping around and screaming curses after them will achieve nothing aside from making you look whipped. They're gone and oncoming cars will never pick you up after what they just saw you do. This could turn into a vicious circle.

Always appear innocent in your part of the dialogue. Mention your mom, talk about an exam that you have to study for. Put the driver at ease. Do not ever speak hatefully or discuss your sex life. Getting too personal too soon is always a turn off.

And remember, when the ride is over, don't get out of the car until you've thanked your new friend sincerely. Ham it up, make them feel good so that they pick up the rest of us hitchhikers.

If you still feel apprehensive about this form of travel, then avoid it. Vibrations of fear are very easy to detect for humans as well as canines, and something terrible may very well happen to you.

As for the rest of you, wax that thumb and happy trails . . . . Ari Vais is a Collegian staff member

Decker said too many students think they can't help the yearly tuition increases, but "they can if they make their pressure consistent.

"If we keep a constant watch on the people who make these decisions, they'll feel the pressure and they'll know they can't just get away with it," she said.

"If the quality of education goes down simultaneously as the tuition goes up, however gradual, it makes me want to transfer," said Jason Smith, a sophomore undecided major. "Any effort we can put forth to halt increases is a good thing."

HSCN's movie menagerie

By JAMIE GORNSTEIN
Collegian Staff

Hey, movie lovers! Hope you're getting pumped for Spring Break. Well, I know I am. Anyway, here's some fun flicks that you can catch on the tube before you all head to some place sunny to catch a few rays. Make sure you see Terminator II before you leave, and don't forget the sunblock! (Hey, I took my Biology of Social Issues class). Now, here are the movies that will be shown beginning on Wednesday, March 11.

The Sound of Music — Julie Andrews, Christopher Plummer, Eleanor Parker. Like Lawrence of Arabia, this movie really must be viewed on a movie screen to get the full effect, but it's always fun to watch the movie that inspired those songs that your third grade teacher made you sing constantly. The film won five Oscars, including Best Picture, Director, and HA! Score Adaptation. (Do, a deer, a female deer...) 1/2

The Bear — Bart, Douce, Jack Wallace. My question is, how did director Jean-Jacques Annaud manage to make those bears do all of those things? I mean, how do bears get acting motivation? In any case, the movie is fantastic...it's about a little (and oh-so-cuddly) bear cub who is orphaned when his mother is killed in an avalanche. He finds a new friend in a MUTHA big bear (I'm not kidding, this thing is HUGE!) who is being stalked by hunters. A top rate movie. ***

The Big Picture — Kevin Bacon, Emily Longstreth, J.T. Walsh. Eh, this one's just okay, and of very typical Kevin Bacon caliber. How old is Kevin anyway, and when is his agent going to get him a challenging role? Nuff said...the movie is about typical yuppie Hollywood wheeling and dealing. Martin Short makes a fantastically humorous cameo appearance as an agent. An average film. **

Gallipoli — Mark Lee, Mel Gibson, Bill Kerr. Ooh! Ooh! Mel in all of his prime, the same year that The Road Warrior came out. Gibson and Lee enlist in the military during WWI in a very powerful drama, with fantastic directing, acting, and convincing period detail. The plot is very intriguing...don't miss! ***

Heart Like A Wheel — Bonnie Bedelia, Beau Bridges, Leo Rossi. Bedelia is a race-car driver who has to deal with sexism to be a seriously considered candidate on the race track. No, no...it's not like that heinous movie Days of Thunder, but it ain't a winner, either. **

Cat Ballou — Jane Fonda, Lee Marvin, Michael Callan. This movie is hysterical, and very different for Fonda. She's a schoolteacher turned outlaw, and Marvin (who won an Oscar for his role) plays twins, which you've gotta see to believe. Guaranteed by this reviewer for a few genuine laughs. ***

Home Alone — Macaulay Culkin, Catherine O'Hara, Joe Pesci. Okay, okay, is there anyone out there who hasn't seen this one yet? Hello? Anyone? Okay, okay, if you haven't, tell me you don't know the plot. There was more hype to this movie than I thought humanly possible, and I thought I was the last one to see it. I loved it anyway, despite its cutesie-pie-ness. ***

The Keep — Scott Glenn, Ian McKellen, Alberta Watson. Sorry Dad, I know you liked it, but quite honestly I thought it was a piece of (expletive). No offense. This movie is about German soldiers during WWII who are trying to defend a Romanian mountain pass. Disastrously dumb, but some better than average acting. Not much, but some. *

The Kids Are Alright — Fantastic display of some of the Who's best. The documentary is dazzling, the cameos by Steve Martin, Ringo Starr, and Tom Smothers are a delight, and the songs, which include some from "Tommy" are incomparable with most rock 'n roll today. It puts some modern groups to shame. 1/2

The Man Who Loved Women — Burt Reynolds, Julie Andrews, Kim Basinger, Marilu Henner. Remake of the 1977 Francois Truffaut film, but it doesn't quite measure up. Reynolds, however, is sparkling as always as a man who (can you guess or shall I spell it out) loved women. Andrews is fair as his psychiatrist. 1/2

Outrageous Fortune — Bette Midler, Shelley Long, Peter Coyote. You know, I never would have thought that Midler and Long would have had on-screen chemistry, but I guess I was wrong. These two funny women are even funnier together as they discover than they have been having an affair with the same man who stages his own death. A laugh a minute. ***

Plenty — Meryl Streep, Charles Dance, Tracey Ullman. Based on David Hare's play about a British woman who never finds satisfaction in her life after her glorious days during WWII. Streep, surprisingly, is very blah and unmotivated. The movie itself, sadly, is more or less the same. Basically less. *1/2

The Right Hand Man — Rupert Everett, Hugo Weaving, Catherine McClements. It's a dry and unmoving drama about aristocrat Everett who hires stage coach driver Weaving. Kinda like a watered down version of Driving Miss Daisy, but it does have some moments. **

Scrooged — Bill Murray, Karen Allen, John Forsythe. Jam-packed full of stars, this updated version of A Christmas Carol with a VERY strong and worthwhile message of brotherhood is not nearly as good as the original, but then again, this is a different genre. It's more comedy than anything, but switches to a drama a tad drastically. Still, it's fun, and who the heck doesn't like Bill Murray? 1/2

Stir Crazy — Gene Wilder, Richard Pryor, George Stanford Brown. No real in-depth plot, but the comedic team of Wilder and Pryor is enough to leave anyone in stitches. The two guys manage to bungle themselves into prison. Again, full of stars. The laughs alone are enough to catch this one at least once. ***

Taxi Driver — Robert DeNiro, Cybill Shepherd, Jodie Foster. For some, this movie is a sick, ugly, and disgusting portrayal of the crazed mind of a N.Y.C. cab driver. For others, myself included, it is brilliant and poignant. Director Martin Scorsese literally scorches the screen. The film is hard-hitting...don't you dare miss it! ****

Terminator 2: Judgement Day — Arnold Schwarzenegger, Robert Patrick, Linda Hamilton. Schwarzenegger's back, but this time he's the good guy, and he must protect Hamilton's son, John, who is being targeted for termination by the advanced evil cyborg played by Patrick. You won't get much dialogue from Patrick, but the special effects instilled upon his body will completely blow you away. 1/2

Movies that are on HSCN this week but are not reviewed are: Drop Dead Fred, One Good Cop, and The Miracle.

Spring Break in Amherst

By SEMAJ SELOM
Collegian Staff

Just in case you're not heading South for Spring break, have no fear, since the music will continue to come around. On Friday, March 13, the Buster Williams Quintet will be in performance at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton.

The bassist has garnered quite a bit of critical acclaim while heading up his own group, which is rather uncommon for a bassist. His quintet will feature some of the finer young players on the scene today: Renee Rosnes on piano (she led her own quintet in last year's Magic Triangle Series), her husband Billy Drummond on percussion, Steve Wilson on alto and soprano saxophones, and Shunzo Ohno on trumpet. There will be on show, starting at 7 p.m., tickets are $9.50 and available in advance at 586-8686.

Following up Buster Williams will be a performance by young saxophonist Christopher Hollyday on Saturday, March 14. Hollyday has been called both a wunderkind and an out-of-tune Charlie Parker imitator. I've found his albums on the Novus label to be unassuming, but it's necessary to see a live performance before passing a final judgement. Hollyday will be playing two shows, at 7 and 10 p.m. Tickets are $9.50 and are also available in advance at 586-8686.

The weekend wraps up with a show from the Charlie Sepulveda Sextet at the Zone Arts Center in downtown Springfield on Sunday, March 15.

The concert is part of WTCC-FM's ongoing concert series sponsored by the Zone and the African-American Music Society of WTCC.

Ralph Moore, James Williams and others have appeared previously, and Bobby Waston is due in the near future. His debut release on the Antilles label demonstrates a command of many musical idioms, including Latin and Afro-Cuban.

Tickets are available in advance at Dynamite Records in Northampton, and For the Record in Amherst for $14. Tickets at the door are $16.

If you haven't been to one of these concerts at the Zone, you should make a point of it.

After Spring break, the Valley's "jazz" scene picks up right where it left off, with the David Murray All Star Quartet, featuring John Hicks, Ray Drummond and Tani Tabbal. The quartet will be playing the second installment of this year's Magic Triangle Concert Series, sponsored by WMUA-FM.

The first show (the Ed Blackwell Trio) sold out in advance, and the Murray gig is sure to do the same. If you're smart you'll get your ticket before the break, at the Fine Arts Center box offic, 545-2511. Prices are $7/$5 for 5-College students. The show is Thursday, March 26, in the Hampden Theatre on the UMass campus.

The Bard's text brought to life

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

As You Like It
Red Barn Theatre, Hampshire College
March 10-13, 8 p.m.

While I realize that some may view it as akin to heresy, I must begin this review by saying that Shakespeare's As You Like It really isn't all that good. I am not referring, here, to the current Red Barn prodution, but rather to the Bard's text itself. Like many of Shakespeare's smaller works, "As You Like It" is essentially a curious part of theatre history, best kept on the shelf and off the stage. Breathing any life into a lifeless script, even one by the crowned prince of English Literature, is never too easy.

If Christopher Werler does not always succeed in wowing the audience with his production, it is not by lack of trying. Werler is a careful, insightful director, who seems to know exactly which way a moment should be played. Where many Shakespeare directors gravitate towards either the road most travelled, or wildly inappropriate "conceptual" stagings, Werler is able to reach a great compromise of the two. His production is faithful and earthbound, but rarely predictable.

The only thing which tends to get in the way of Werler's direction is his attempts to make the play seem timeless. While the themes of the play may truly be timeless, the play itself is very much a product of Shakespeare's age. The period-unspecific costuming does not create a sense of universality, but rather, when combined with Shakespeare's text, takes us straight to the fifteenth century. Thus, when anachronisms (such as "Dick and Jane" books or modern-looking guitars and wheelbarrows) crop up, it strains the suspension of disbelief.

The main action of the play follows a standard Shakespeare comedy formula, in which a man loves a woman who, for some flimsy reason, is disguised as a man. There are numerous mistaken identities and an obligatory clown — "hilarity" ensues.

What makes this rather predictable fare fun for a modern audience is a quartet of wonderful performers. Lee Ann Hutchison oozes a bizarre sexuality as Rosalind, the play's gender-bending lead, and becomes a "man" with remarkable ease. Kelly Christopher is radiant as her cousin and co-conspirator, and Megan McEnulty is a comic scene stealer as the woman who falls in love with Rosalind's male alter-ego. Most impressive, however, is Dominic Oliver, who pours every ounce of energy into his madcap portrayal of Touchstone the clown.

Unfortunately, these four stars are flanked by a woefully inadequate supporting cast — and it is that which hurts the show more than anything else. Peter Piasecj's romantic hero is shamelessly overplayed, and Roy Drew's rantings, as the villain, degenerate into shtick within minutes of his first appearance.

Ultimately, "As You Like It" is a rather mixed bag — best left to admirers of the Bard, who will doubtless find, in Chris Werler's direction, much that is worth liking.

Third World Affairs

Changing of the guard: crime and corruption at U.N.

At the United Nations, former boss Javier Perez de Cuellar is out, new overlord Boutros Boutros-Ghali is in. Time, perhaps, to take stock of recent trends at that institution, although the task resembles a rummage through last week's garbage bin. One should begin by assessing the "achievements" of the outgoing de Cuellar.

Let us not mince words. Mr. Perez de Cuellar is a blood-spattered war criminal of the first order. He and his worthless organization have presided over, and given their imprimatur to, one of the greatest mass murders in modern history.

The excellent war crimes tribunal that recently found various U.S. officials guilty of a number of the most shocking war crimes has unfortunately overlooked one of the most guilty men — de Cuellar.

Through the mechanism of "sanctions," hand in hand with the U.S. bombing, the U.N Security Council and the Secretariat which he headed were nominally responsible for the deaths of 300,000 Iraqis, including 100,000 children. He has never uttered a word of remorse, or the slightest acknowledgment of his monumental personal guilt. He has given Iraq nothing but death.

The standard line of the U.S. Left, much of which seems to harbor inexplicable illusions about the value of the U.N., has been to see the organization as another "victim" of the war. If this entirely dubious sentiment has any value, it must be recognized that that "victimization" was conducted BY de Cuellar.

The entire thrust of his ignoble tenure was to turn over all authority in the U.N. to the U.S. Perhaps the most shining moment in his regime came during an exchange he had with President Saddam Hussein of Iraq, whom he was pressuring to obey U.N. dictats.

President Saddam: These are American resolutions. This is an American age. What the U.S. wants at present is the thing that gets passed, and not what the Security Council wants.

de Cuellar: I agree with you as much as the matter involves me. (This dialogue requires no comment. There you have it.)

AP Photo

A JOB WELL DONE-Bush Awards the highest U.S. civilian honor, the Medal of Freedom, to Javier Perez de Cuellar

In his official report of the conversation, the U.N. boss blatantly distorted Saddam's willingness to negotiate.

In its conduct at the U.N., the U.S. used every tool of coercion, bribery, blackmail and threats to get its way in the Security Council. Yemen, the lone Arab state in the council, was told that its "no" vote on the resolution to attack Iraq would be "the most expensive no vote you ever cast." True to promise, the U.S. cut off all aid, and Saudi Arabia expelled 900,000 Yemenis.

Hussein Ibish

U.N. officials marvelled at this exercise of what they called "raw power," but de Cuellar was a picture of calm and aplomb. His banality continued throughout the process of slaughtering Iraq. If any man never showed the slightest concern for his victims, it was de Cuellar. Even when his own aides reported the magnitude of suffering and dying, he said and did nothing.

The reason for this is obvious. He considers the slaughter in Iraq a job well done. This man works for the United States! In the course of his leadership of that benighted institution, he handed it over lock, stock, and barrel to his American masters.

In the tradition of the first-rate domestic, it was presented on a silver salver, service with a smile. Well, he got his praise, his medal and his money. But even good dogs get old and tiresome.

Enter Dr. Boutros-Ghali. He is a long time servant of the interests and agenda of the West, called up both to consolidate the new order (U.N.=U.S.) and as a reward for past efforts.

Dr. Boutros-Ghali is known primarily as the Egyptian architect of the Camp David accords, in which Egypt sold its foreign policy independence to the U.S. for raw cash.

They made a separate peace with Israel, turning their backs on their former Palestinian and Lebanese allies, disregarding their interests and allowing them to be attacked. For many, he embodies Egyptian government treachery.

At Sadat's Israel visit, he took the place of Foreign Minister Fahmi who had the decency to resign rather than participate.

In the process, he developed many interesting relationships, including his warm friendship with Moshe Dayan, one of the most brutal Israeli leaders of all. He visited Dayan in his hospital bed, and eulogized him at his funeral. What a fine Arab diplomat.

Ghali has the entirely unearned distinction of being "Africa's turn" at the Secretariat. But, being backed by France, the U.S., Israel, and the New York Times, that is rendered meaningless.

Now enthroned in New York, Ghali has set to work consolidating and completing the process of total Westernization de Cuellar began. He spoke on Jan. 31, leaving little doubt of his agenda.

"With all the convulsions in global society, only one power is left that can impose order on incipient chaos. [whatever can he be talking about? That's right, it's. . .] The power of principles."

This must surely rank among the most cynical pieces of double-speak in the history of diplomacy, a transparent allusion to his superpower American employers, sauced in lofty moral rhetoric.

"Civil wars are no longer civil," he asserted, "New ways of preventing internal disputes and inter-state confrontations will need to be developed. State sovereignty takes on a new meaning in this context," laying groundwork for future U.N./U.S. aggression.

Perhaps even more ominously he intoned, "The United Nations will have to adopt a new strategy to respond to the irredentist or pro-autonomy claims of ethnic and cultural communities. It will have to take into account the abundant supply of arms. . ." His approach to Palestinian autonomy makes this all the more chilling.

But in three months at the top, Ghali has already gone far beyond words. He has "reorganized" the Secretariat.

It should come as no surprise that he has emphasized "peace keeping and peace making" (intervention and aggression) at the expense of social and developmental issues.

The whole structure has been "rationalized" into eight departments. They are overwhelmingly dominated by Europeans, and the all-important Department of Administration and Management is slated to be run by the unelectable Bush lackey, Richard Thornburgh. Ghali insisted on an American having this job.

What more appropriate way of demonstrating the real locus of power at the U.N.? As Ghali has said, "It is one of those occasions when symbol enhances substance."

Hussein Ibish is a Collegian staff member. These opinions are not necessarily those of the Collegian.

New U.N. Boss Boutros Butros-Ghali with close friend Moshe Dayan in 1979 during the Camp David negotiations.

Final defeat: the last days of the Cuban revolution?

"For every life lost on the battlefields of the Persian Gulf, a thousand persons will die of hunger in the Third World." [Fidel Castro, September 1990, in a statement to the United Nations]

Throughout the Gulf War, when most countries either shamelessly participated in the bloodbath or helplessly stood by in silence, Cuba consistently spoke out against the U.S. rampage and the horrible consequences entailed for the Third World.

Cuba is one of only two countries on the Security Council which refused to support economic sanctions, air embargoes or military action against Iraq, or demand reparations from the Iraqi people, or support withholding food and medicine from Iraqis.

It is now about to pay the price for its folly, absolutely the last straw in three decades of "intransigence," perhaps the worst transgression being the extraordinary military intervention on behalf of the long-suffering people of Angola, rescued from the colonial jackboot of South Africa.

Ever since the threat posed to U.S. slave-owners by the Cuban independence movement last century, which advocated abolition of slavery, the United States has been determined to stifle any attempts by Cubans to control their own destiny.

The Cuban revolution in 1959, which ended the party for corrupt U.S. businessmen and their Cuban proteges, also marked the beginning of more than three decades of counterrevolutionary subversion, destabilization and terrorism by the United States against the people and infrastructure of Cuba.

The dying gasps of Bolshevism have emboldened the preserver of the (New World) Order, and its attitudes and actions towards Cuba have now reached a fever pitch.

On Dec. 29 this past year, an armed infiltration of Cuba was launched from Florida. The three intruders, it was discovered, intended to use explosive and other incendiary devices in industrial centers like paper and thermoelectric works, as well as recreation areas, public transit, movie theaters and cultural centers. Predictably, the execution of the leader of these infiltrators met with cries of "human rights violations" in the United States.

Madanmohan Rao

Four days later, on Jan. 3, 34 Cuban deserters fled to Miami in a stolen helicopter. U.S. media hailed this as "a daring escape to freedom," blithely ignoring the connections some of the defectors had to CIA-backed Miami-Cuban organizations, or the fact that the helicopter's escort of U.S. military planes belied a U.S. hand in the escape.

Contrast this with the manner in which Haitian refugees were intercepted, rounded up, arrested and finally deported to a grim and uncertain fate — but more on that in a later edition.

On Jan. 9, three Cuban security officials were gunned down in an attempt by deserters to steal a boat to flee the country.

Inspired by its military "success" in the Gulf, the U.S. military steps up surveillance flights over Cuba, flagrantly violating its airspace, and resumes full-scale rehearsals of an invasion of Cuba, deliberately intimidating its citizens.

Add to this recent U.S. machinations in the United Nations, which unabashedly abandon all future commitments to non-intervention, and essentially give the United States justification for a full-scale invasion on the grounds of protecting "human rights."

Meanwhile, funding for counterrevolutionary activities continues unabated. The Washington-based National Endowment for "Democracy" has channelled millions of dollars to Cuban exile organizations which join the CIA in advocating subversion of the Cuban revolution.

A top grant was awarded to the AFL-CIO's American Institute for "Free Labor Development" to set up counter-trade unions to Cuba's three million-strong labor union movement. It is the very same NED which was a prime contributor to the coalition which toppled the Sandinistas in the 1990 Nicaraguan elections.

And on top of it all, the three-decade embargo on Cuba continues to strangulate its economy. Coupled with the severing of supplies of oil, food and machinery from the former Soviet Union, the blockade now poses Cuba its most unprecedented challenge ever.

The embargo, first imposed in 1962 by the Kennedy administration, blocked food and medicine after the devastating Cyclone Flora. It contributed to the deaths of more than 100 children in 1981 during an epidemic of the deadly dengue fever.

Operation Desert Storm witnessed the marriage of two of America's favorite pastimes — war and videogames, and is now followed by a merciless economic blockade to punish the Iraqi people. Economic warfare was also used to oust the Sandinistas, and to bring Vietnam to its knees — it is now being unleashed in all its fury on the people of Cuba.

The embargo is being extended to all U.S. subsidiaries abroad, and any ship landing in Cuba is banned from U.S. ports for six months, otherwise its cargo is liable to be seized if it enters U.S. waters.

With its Guantanamo military base sitting right in Cuba's backyard, the United States could easily roll over Cuba if it wanted to — but it prefers the current approach, characterized by a curious mix of sadism and vaunted magnanimity.

For the United States, it would be much better if the Cuban revolution were driven to ruin and self-destruction, so that it could all be blamed on Fidel Castro: "Castro's reign deserves to end in homegrown failure, not martyrdom," says the New York Times.

It may well be objected by those who recognize the tremendous gains of the Cuban revolution that we do not mention more of these achievements here. The simple and unfortunate truth is that there is little time for such reflections on these accomplishments, when the very nation itself is on the brink of recolonization.

Also, this is no time to romanticize Cuba, or see it as a kind of ideal, a vague and abstract utopia. It is not. It is a proud and great nation going through hard times, and in grave danger of imperial assault. What it doesn't need is empty words, hollow gestures, and vapid accolades.

Cuba, at this time, needs support more than ever. In the words of Jose Marti almost a century ago, "Whoever stands today alongside Cuba, stands forever."

But who will stand alongside Cuba today? Indeed, who can stand alongside Cuba?

Have a nice Spring Break.

Virtual Reality, the new technology that allows people to escape into a computerized world with the aid of gloves and goggles is given the nightmare treatment in The Lawnmower Man, a science fiction thriller from Stephen King.

Pierce Brosnan (Remington Steele) plays Dr. Angelo, a government scientist whose research yields an important new discovery. With Virtual Reality, he is able to raise the intelligence levels in chimps. When that leads to tragedy, Dr. Angelo retreats to his suburban home.

He then decides to try the program on Jobe (Jeff Fahey), a retarded man who lives in a shack adjacent to a church and mows lawns. The experiment works wonders at first, as Jobe becomes smarter and learns at an accelerated pace. But then things start going terribly wrong. Jobe, once a child-like man becomes a monster.

The Lawnmower Man, from a short story by Stephen King, is a fascinating journey inside the budding technology of Virtual Reality. Director Brett Leonard plunges into these scenes with vigor, creating a spectacular ride. The effects alone are worth the price of admission.

It seems, however, that the entire budget went to these thrilling effects. Everything else suffers, from the generic plot to cheap looking sets, The Lawnmower Man looks like Tron gone awry. Don't be carried away by the seemingly 'scary' undertones, it's convention all the way.

The film tries to raise many questions involving the consequences of technology going too far. Laden with too-obvious religious images and resemblences to Charly, (Flowers for Algernon) The Lawnmower Man is simply not equipped to make such sweeping statements. It's like one of those "special episodes" of sitcoms that try to deal with drunk driving or death, it just doesn't work.

While the film tries to be deep and innovative, it comes off as a bit preachy and all the effects in the world cannot save this film from being one long cliche.

For instance, the minute the film shows the abusive priest, co-worker, and next-door neighbor being mean to Jobe, you just know that when he becomes powerful...

The film also parades a host of stock characters, from the precocious little boy to the ridiculously brooding "director," the supporting players seem straight out of an episode of Knight Rider.

The cast fares no better. Pierce Brosnan would've made a great James Bond but here's where his career is heading. He puts on glasses to make him look more scientist-like and then disappears into the woodwork. His character is styled as a modern day Dr. Frankenstein — a tortured genius. But the only thing Brosnan is capable of doing well is typing into his terminal. Now that's acting. The rest of the cast is so bland and unrecognizable I forgot who they were.

Jeff Fahey (Body Parts) is slightly better. While he acts straight out of Acting 101 as a simpleton, he makes a great, ferocious villain. His eyes alone are menacing (although he looks very goofy walking around glaring people to death).

The Lawnmower Man does have a macabre and dark sense of humor (courtesy of King no doubt) that shows it's not taking itself that seriously. The ending is ominously clever, contrasting the predictable nature of what came before.

While the special effects are dazzling, The Lawnmower Man fails in just about every other category. If you're desperate to see this movie, catch it in the theaters. The one joy of this film, the forays into Virtual Reality, will no doubt be lost on the small screen. Grade: C+

Lawsuit against Tsongas, Brown dismissed

By MARC HUMBERT
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. — A lawsuit aimed at stripping Paul Tsongas and Edmund G. Brown of spots on New York state's April 7 Democratic presidential primary ballot was thrown out of court Tuesday.

A spokeswoman for the New Alliance Party, which filed the lawsuit, said the ruling would be appealed, but a top New York aide to Tsongas predicted that the bid would fail.

The New York primary, which helps determine the makeup of the second largest delegation to the national convention, could be crucial to Tsongas and Brown if their campaigns are still viable by then.

New York Gov. Mario Cuomo has predicted that Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton will have the nomination sewn up well before April 7.

"We'll appeal this thing until there's no where else to appeal to," said New Alliance spokeswoman Madelyn Chapman. "We're talking major-league fraud."

The New Alliance Party had charged that Tsongas and Brown each violated provisions of New York state's complex law for gaining spots on the election ballot.

But state Supreme Court Justice Anthony Cardona threw out the lawsuit on a technicality. The judge said prospective delegates for Tsongas and Brown hadn't been served with legal notification of the lawsuit.

"The right to participate in the electoral process is among the most cherished in a democracy," Cardona wrote. "That right must not be taken away without a meaningful opportunity to be heard."

State Democratic Part Chairman John Marino, a top politcal aide to Cuomo, said he was "delighted" by the decision.

"This is great news for the Democratic Party and for democracy," Marino said.

In New York, Democratic presidential candidates were required to collect at least 10,000 signatures from enrolled Democrats. The rule of thumb is to collect twice the number of signatures required to survive possible petition from challenges.

Tsongas, a former senator from Massachusetts, filed petitions containing 13,952 signatures while Brown, a former California governor, had 19,413 signatures.

James Armenakis, head of Tsongas' New York campaign, noted that any appeal of Cardona's ruling would have to be on the narrow question to potential delegates and not on the merits of the original lawsuit. That could be to Tsongas' advantage.

The New Alliance Party had made its strongest case against Tsongas, charging that he had paid college students 50 cents for each signature they collected. If true, that's a violation of state law.

Meanwhile, New York City Board of Elections has determined that more than 4,000 of the signatures on the Tsongas petitions aren't valid. That would put Tsongas under the 10,000-signature threshold.

But as Chapman said, unless the lawsuit can be revived, such determinations won't have any impact. For the time being, Tsongas and Brown remain on the New York ballot.

Project Pulse
Student Affairs University of Massachusetts at Amherst

On Wednesday, October 30, 1991, Project PULSE conducted a telephone survey for the Information Data Bank (IDB), operated by the Dean of Students Office. The survey examined levels of student awareness and use of the IDB. PULSE interviewers attempted to contact 840 students selected randomly from the undergraduate student population, and 430 agreed to be interviewed. The response rate for the survey was 51%.

All of the students sampled, regardless of whether they had heard of or used the IDB, were asked which resource they use most to obtain academic information.

Next, students were asked which resource they use most to obtain non-academic information, such as information about clubs, sporting events, UVC, arts events, etc. (see Figure 2).

Finally, students were asked how the IDB could be effectively advertised (see Figure 3).

More than half (51.1%, n=217) of the students said through the Collegian.

Thompson, Gavitt testify in ex-Celtic's trial

BOSTON (AP) — Georgetown basketball coach John Thompson and Boston Celtic executive Dave Gavitt took the stand Tuesday to testify on behalf of Charles Smith, an ex-Celtic charged in the hit-and-run deaths of two students.

Thompson and Gavitt both described Smith, on trial for manslaughter, as a responsible young man with no history of drinking problems.

"You're not talking about a prima donna. You're talking about... a kid who had to do it himself," Thompson testified in Suffolk Superior Court. "He did it truthfully and honestly. He is an extraordinarily decent individual."

Smith, 24, is charged in the deaths of Boston University students Michelle Dartley, 20, of Ridgewood, N.J., and An Trinh, 21, of Placentia, Calif., who were struck on Commonwealth Avenue, a main thoroughfare, the night of March 22.

The defense completed its case Tuesday, and the jury was expected to begin deliberations Wednesday.

Police arrested Smith about a mile from the accident scene. He was charged with two counts each of manslaughter, motor vehicle homicide while under the influence of alcohol and leaving the scene of an accident. He remains free on $100,000 bond.

A Breathalyzer test given to Smith two hours after the accident registered a blood-alcohol content of .06. A reading of .10 is considered legally intoxicated.

Last week, a man riding in the van Smith was driving testified the two had at least two beers before the accident. He also said Smith paused briefly after the accident but then sped away.

Thompson said he met Smith when he was recruiting at St. Anthony's High School in Washington, D.C. At Georgetown, Smith was deemed responsible to be named team captain, Thompson said. Smith also played for the 1988 U.S. Olympic team, which Thompson coached.

Gavitt, senior executive vice president of the Celtics, said he met Smith in the fall of 1985, when Smith was a freshman at Georgetown. Gavitt said Smith was so respected he was chosen to participate in an NBA outreach program for youths.

"There has never been any evidence that Charles was anything but sober at all times," Gavitt said.

Smith's second 10-day contract with the Celtics expired a few days after the accident and the team opted not to sign him to a full contract.

He now plays for the Albany, Ga., Sharp Shooters of the Global Basketball League.

No. 2 Saint Joseph's vs. No. 7 Rhode Island

The Hawks took both regular season games — winning 81-54 at home, and on the road, 70-61. Rhode Island (8-19, 4-12 in the A-10) is led by the play of point guard Anne Kelsen, yet the WRams had to struggle to finish above Duquesne.

Saint Joseph's (11-5 in the A-10), while finishing second in the conference, had a rough non-A-10 schedule and wound up 16-11. Katie Curry leads the Hawks from the guard position.

No. 3 Rutgers vs. No. 6 Temple

The two teams split the regular season, with the Lady Knights winning at home, 85-47, and Temple winning in Philadelphia, 83-74.

Rutgers (18-9, 11-5), with a good showing in the tournament, could wind up in the NCAAs. Unfortunately, two A-10 teams are already locks for the tourney, and there are only 48 spots in the women's bracket, unlike the 64 in the men's.

The Lady Owls (11-16, 8-8 in the conference) have always seemed to have the individual talent, with Sonya Perry, Roxey Hildebrand and Dallese Jackson, but the results haven't shown up in the win-loss column.

No. 4 George Washington vs. No. 5 Saint Bonaventure

The Lady Colonials, ranked 17th in the country, swept the season series, winning 74-65 on the road and destroying the Lady Bonnies, 81-32 in Washington.

George Washington might want to win the automatic bid to secure a NCAA berth since it finished fourth in the conference.

Reardon is key to Sox' success

He lives by the fastball and dies by the fastball. . .

Jeff Reardon, who can still pump his number one well into the 90s, has yet to learn that his strength can also be his weakness. In a year that could be marked by sweet tunes being sung by Frank Viola and the Rocket going for his record-tying fourth Cy Young, Jeff Reardon might be the key ingredient to the Red Sox winning another A.L. East Pennant — giving the Sox a chance to redeem their streak of eight-straight losses in the playoffs.

I think every Sox fan is confident that both Clemens and Viola are capable of 20 wins, and along with a healthy Danny Darwin and a rejuvenated Joe Hesketh, the Sox could be looking at a starting rotation that far surpasses any since their trip to the Series in 1986.

Scott Silverman

But in today's game, a good closer is an integral part of a successful team, as proven by the past two World Series Champions. Rick Aguilera helped secure the best record in Major League Baseball for the 1991 Champions, the Minnesota Twins. And Dennis Eckersely did the same for Oakland in 1990.

Jeff Reardon, a UMass graduate, again remained one of the top relievers in baseball last year. Unfortunately, he also played a major role in what could be pinpointed as the collapse of the Red Sox

On Aug. 8, 1991 the Red Sox were 11-1/2 games behind the Toronto Blue Jays. Only six weeks later, on September 22, Reardon was one strike away from giving the Red Sox a 1/2 game lead over the Jays. However, just as Reardon threw one too many fastballs to Mel Hall earlier in the year, he again tempted fate with the Yankees' Roberto Kelly, only to see the same result — a game-winning homer that burst the Red Sox balloon.

Not only did the Red Sox lose the momentum that had made it look all but impossible for them to win the pennant, but they lost a confident Reardon. Reardon has yet to learn the secret that has made Roger Clemens such a great pitcher.

His ability to go to other pitches and set up his fastball is one reason he has remained so intimidating to hitters. On the other hand, Reardon (who has a good slider), rarely fails to come at a batter with anything but the obvious — a fastball right down the middle of the plate asking to make a dent in the Green Monster.

I hope I am not the only Red Sox fan that doesn't want to see Reardon become another Calvin Shiraldi and start giving up ninth-inning moon shots like he's hosting a homerun derby.

Women's track places eighth

Ambrose and Johnson eclipse school track records

By CHRIS CUDDY
Collegian Staff

What a difference a year makes.

Last year, with Lee Ann Ambrose on the shelf with a bronchial infection, the University of Massachusetts women's indoor track team returned from the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference Championship's with zero points and a disappointing end to a fantastic season.

This season, the Minutewomen returned home from the ECAC's with a surprising 8th place finish, with Ambrose leading the way to UMass' first-ever individual ECAC Championship in the 500-meters.

Ambrose was in third place going into the third turn, when the leader (George Masons' Anya Mironova) began to pull away from the pack. At this point, Ambrose turned on the jets, caught and then passed Mironova en route to a 1/100 of a second victory.

"Lee Ann just ran a great race," UMass coach Julie LaFreniere said. "She saw Miranova pull away, and from then on it looked like she had rockets on out there."

Ambrose's time of 1:12.95 sets a new UMass record, one of two to be broken last weekend.

UMass' other record breaker was Becky Johnson, who broke the school record in the 1000, with a time of 2:51.97.

Johnson's loss came at the hands of Fordham's Lauren Gubicza, who is presently ranked number 2 in the nation in the 1000 meter run. "Becky wasn't scared of anything," LaFreniere said. "She went right out there and ran with Gubicza but couldn't stay with her till the end. And Gubicza ended up smashing the ECAC record."

Ambrose and Johnson accounted for all of UMass' 18 points, vaulting them into a three-way tie for eighth with Maryland and James Madison.

"Going into the meet, I would've thought we would be lucky to get a top 20 finish," LaFreniere said. "But we got some great performances and surprised some people."

The Minutewomen also got key performances from Kelly Liljeblad in the 3000, Lennice Johnson in the 500, Janey Meeks in the triple jump, and Diane Ozzolek in the shot put, as well as the 4x800 relay team of Ambrose, Kerry Acker, Kim Liljeblad, and Johnson.

Liljeblad recorded a seventh place finish, as did the 4x800 team, while Lennice Johnson, Meeks and Oslek did not make the finals, although they did record personal best's in their respective events.

The ECAC's close out a successfull 1992 campaign in which the Minutewomen finished with a 15-4 dual meet record, and top 10 finishes in both the New England's and ECAC's.

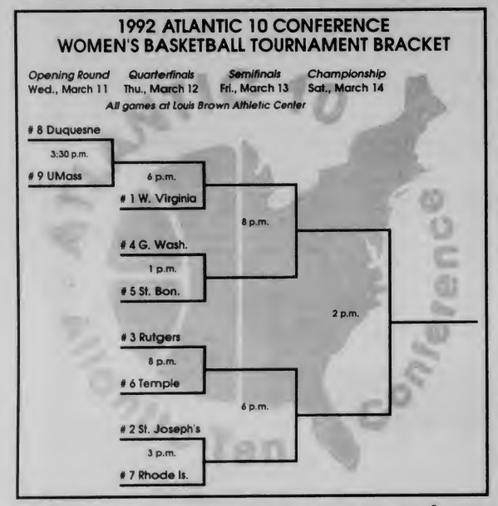
Minutewomen at Atlantic 10 tourney



By KEVIN HERLIHY and MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

As has been the case in many of its games this season, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team has really nothing to lose in today's contest.

The difference between this game and any other game this season is that a loss means no tomorrow.

The Minutewomen (4-23 overall, 0-16 in the A-10) play the Duquesne Lady Dukes (5-22, 3-13) in the opening round of the Atlantic 10 Championship tournament at 3:30 p.m. at Rutgers University.

UMass is on a 13-game losing streak, while Duquesne has lost five in a row. The winner has the unenviable task of playing the tournament's No. 1 seed and 11th in the country, West Virginia, Thursday night.

Both times UMass and Duquesne have met this season, the Minutewomen have been on the losing end.

On Jan. 18 at the Curry Hicks Cage, the Lady Dukes broke open a close game late in the contest, on their way to a 70-59 win. Duquesne's leading scorer was Darcie Vincent, who tossed in a game-high 21 points. UMass' Kim Kristofik had a monstrous game, scoring 19 points and pulling down 15 rebounds.

The team's second meeting saw the Minutewomen rally, but fall, 76-68. Vincent again led all scorers with 24 points. UMass' Jen Moran had a career outing, scoring 24 points and adding 12 rebounds.

"I think we match-up with Duquesne really well," said UMass assistant coach Doug Kaiser. "The key is we have to go out and stop their 3-point shooting."

The Lady Dukes average almost 12 3-pointers per game, while hitting four.

Duquesne is led by the tandem of Vincent, who averages 17 points and five rebounds per game, and Kris Sebastion, who adds 14 points and four rebounds.

Kristofik leads the Minutewomen with 13 points and seven rebounds per game and Jen Moran is close behind with 12 points and six rebounds per contest.

Here's a quick glance at the quarterfinal game matchups:

No. 1 West Virginia versus Massachusetts-Duquesne winner

The Mountaineers, led by head coaches Kitty Blakemore and Scott Harrelson, started the season as second fiddle in the Atlantic 10 to rival George Washington. But, West Virginia took apart the Lady Colonials twice and are currently ranked in the top half of the Top 25.

Led by All-American candidate Rosemary Kosiorek, the Mountaineers (25-2, 16-0) have been unstoppable in league play, as they went undefeated through the conference for only the second time in A-10 history.

Women gymnasts win ninth

Furtado and Marshall perform record-breakers

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

Most people thought that last Friday's season high of 186.2 points against the University of New Hampshire would not be topped by the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics squad.

What they didn't count on were record-breaking performances by Margaret Furtado and Tammy Marshall and an overall strong team performance as the UMass gymnasts won resoundingly over the University of Illinois at Chicago, 188.1-179.05.

Furtado set a new school record of 9.8 in the beam exercise which has been a trouble-spot all season for her and Marshall achieved a personal best of 38.75 in the floor routine. Marshall also placed second in the beam with a 9.7.

"All year long, the beam has been our lowest scoring event," said UMass coach Alfie Mitchell. "Today, it was our highest We started out slow because of the strange starting time [5 p.m.] but when we finally got to the beam, Margaret [Furtado] was absolutely flawless, as were Tammy [Marshall] and Emily [Lueck].

"What the high score on the beam allowed us to do was to go into the final event [the floor] at 140 total points so we were in great shape at this point," he said.

In the floor event, every UMass competitor scored over 9.0 with Marshall taking individual honors by scoring a 9.8. The next highest score for UMass was 9.5 by Lisa-Beth Cronen.

"Tammy had her best performance of the year on floor," assistant coach Mary Ann McChesney said. "All season she's been trying to nail a flip that few collegiate competitors can do called an arabian double front. Today she finally did."

On bars, it was Marshall again who took first with a 9.55 followed by 9.35 by Erica Baum.

"The bars was not our best event but I think we were able to get cooking for the rest of the meet with our performance," Mitchell said.

All-Around, Marshall was first for the meet, followed by Illinois' Andi Szatkowski (37.95) and teammate Furtado who scored 37.35. UMass' Gina Demeo placed fifth with a 37.05.

The vault was the weakest event for the UMass gymnasts but there were still two impressive performances. One by Marshall (9.7) and the other by UMass' Angela Gent (9.45). Szatkowski was second in the vault with a 9.55.

"It's good that we're hitting most of our routines now so we'll be ready for the last part of the season and the postseason," Mitchell said. "If we get one more high score (185 or above) then I'd say we're pretty much locked into an invitation to the (Northeast) Regionals on April 11.

"We won't rest until we do get this bid," he said. "But our chances look good especially with our record (9-3)."

The upcoming meets at Temple on Sunday and at Penn State (with UNH/West Virginia) look to be difficult ones for UMass but if everyone preforms up to par, Mitchell said, they should have no problems.

"We have to have a little luck to be on for the upcoming meets," he said.

Mitchell praised his team for its overall strength and unity.

"I don't think we can say that there is any one particular person who is the MVP this year," Mitchell said. "Every day someone different steps in because of injuries or whatever. So I think it's fair to say that the whole team is the MVP."

Scott's shots

Portions of this week's ramblings were discovered in a Vermont hot tub this past weekend. For the record, I left my brain in the same warm, bubbling water.

•All of these extra basketball games are giving Coach John Calipari additional chances to win the coveted "Cravat King" award for best tie of the year.

Al Skinner was named Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year (by the way, odds at URI of Skinner winning were placed at 6 to 1) but he can't touch Calipari in the more important area of neckwear. Of course, yours truly is still the frontrunner, but some sweet silks during the tournament could catapult Calipari into first.

I just hope all these tie-related distractions don't have an impact on Cal's preparations for the Big Dance.

David Scott

•I watched the new Larry Bird video a month ago and I marvelled at the "young Bird" in action. I longed for the young Bird. The Bird who dominated every game he played and he did it with style.

Then I watched last Friday night's game and I marvelled at the "older Bird" in action. All at once, I appreciated what he means to the Celtics even as his career winds down. His tools might be a little old and rusty, but his mere presence on the court gives the Celtics an added dimension. A dimension they cannot do without

•We can go no further without mentioning the leading Horse of the Year candidate, Charlie, who last week remained incredibly calm under unsettling circumstances.

As numerous horses "freaked" at the sight of pigeons, Charlie calmly settled in the middle of the ring and laughed at his counterparts. Recruit, a fiesty equine for sure, did his best imitation of a bucking bronco and the resulting scene closely resembled the Calgary Stampede. One classmate got tossed head first into the boards, but his quick recovery cinched the "Comeback Rider of the Year Award."

•I sure do make up a lot of stupid awards.

•Has anyone played the building blocks game called "Jenga?" I think I'm world-class material and my tradition of screaming "JEN-GAAAA" at the end of each successful turn could become commonplace.

One last thing on the Coach Cal's Pals and it comes from our sports maven, The Shirl: "They'll get a fourth or fifth seed, win the first game and then lose a heartbreaker. Watch for Lou Roe to bring his game up another notch."

The Shirl was outraged that Roe didn't get Freshman of the Year honors in the A-10.

"What a farce," The Shirl screamed. "He's only playing 20 minutes a game and still averaging seven points and six boards."

•The big question is, "If the NHL goes on strike and nobody's there to see it, will it make a sound?" I already thought they were on strike.

False bomb threat empties Bartlett Hall

By DAVID RIVERA
Collegian Staff

Classrooms and offices in Bartlett Hall were evacuated yesterday by University of Massachusetts Police following a false bomb threat, sending more than 200 people into the cold morning rain.

At approximately 11 a.m. police were forced to evacuate Bartlett after the police dispatcher received a call saying that a bomb was placed somewhere in the building.

With most people unaware of the threat and assuming it was a routine fire drill, police and fire officials searched Bartlett while students and faculty waited in the rain for re-entry into the building.

Emily Hickey, a freshman art history major, was driven from her women studies midterm exam and voiced her anger at what she believed to be a prank.

"I don't think it's real," Hickey said. "It's someone playing a joke or trying to get out of taking a test."

Hickey was just one of many students interrupted during midterms yesterday forcing them to retake their exams after Spring Break.

After a 30-minute search and a posting of signs warning that entry was "at your own risk," officials allowed people back into the building.

Vincent DiMarco, building coordinator for Bartlett, was notified and made the decision to evacuate the building.

"We have to take these things seriously," DiMarco said. "You never know if threats are real."

DiMarco added that such pranks are both dangerous and costly.

"These pranks can be very dangerous," DiMarco said. "People can be hurt when evacuating a building."

DiMarco, aware of the threat, went around to classes before officials pulled the fire alarm and pre-warned classes to help prevent chaos.

Amherst Assistant Fire Chief George Bowler said the hoax was a nuisance but officials have to regard them as valid for public safety.

"We have to assume they're real," Bowler said, "but the police handle pranks because such a hoax is a felony."

Bowler said the fire department was notified immediately after the call and prepared to assist police if needed.

Bowler also said that in his experience bomb threats tend to pick up during exam week.

"These things tend to center around exam time," Bowler said. "People should realize that if you're caught the police can arrest you and the University could expel you."

Posters warning of the bomb threats remained on Bartlett's doors throughout the day.

In addition to the written warnings, UMass security was also on hand to monitor the building for any problems that might have occurred.

Bartlett houses the Journalism, English, Women's Studies and the Freshman Writing Program as well as many classrooms, including a large lecture hall.

Redistricting passes

State aims to retain U.S. House seat

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld, who signed a congressional redistricting bill into law Wednesday, acknowledged that his concerns in redrawing the map for U.S. House seats were largely political.

"It think it's a fair compromise," said Weld, a Republican, of the final map.

There are no Republicans in Massachusetts' current 11-member congressional delegation, and the plan strengthens GOP chances of winning a seat in Congress.

The state is in the midst of a court battle over Massachusetts' attempt to keep all its seats. Massachusetts has challenged 1990 U.S. Census figures that showed the state should lose a seat. The state of Washington was slated to gain one.

Before the ink was barely dry on the governor's signature, Secretary of State Michael J. Connolly made nomination papers available for congressional candidates.

"People were picking them up today by the hundreds," Connolly said.

State officials said that by moving the redistricting process on to the next step, the state strengthened its case to keep 11 seats. A federal court has ruled in Massachusetts' favor. But the U.S. Department of Justice, representing the Census, has warned the state it intends to fight for a reversal of the decision.

By moving nomination papers quickly, Massachusetts can make the argument that the loss of a seat would cause confusion in the state's 1992 congressional campaign.

"We feel very good about this," Connolly said. "We feel as though this is a major victory. The important thing is that we have got this process rolling and we are really establishing the hardship argument if the court were ever to reverse itself."

Nomination papers for congressional races must be returned to local election officials by May 5.

Weld gained several concessions from the Democratic controlled Legislature, improving the chances of GOP challengers in the state. He acknowledged that was his goal.

"I think it's legitimate on a redistricting discussion for politics to enter into it," Weld said.

One of the major changes was the removal of part of New Bedford from the 10th Congressional District, now represented by U.S. Rep. Gerry Studds (D-Mass.) New Bedford is heavily Democratic, and the shift was seen as a way to help the chances of GOP candidates, including former Weld administration

Spring Break requires sun, sex precautions

By KATE CHAMBERLIN
Collegian Correspondent

If you're going away for Spring Break next week, there are a few last minute details to take care of: flight confirmations, travellers checks and packing. But don't forget sunblock, condoms and common sense for a fun, but safe, vacation.

Before you go out to the beach, remember that this is the first exposure to the sun your skin has had since the sweater season began. Your skin is particularly vulnerable to burning now, even if you regularly tan.

To protect yourself, use a sunscreen at least for the first few times in the sun. Check the labels for an ingredient called PABA, which shields against the harmful ultraviolet rays of the sun. Zinc oxide, usually opaque white, is even more powerful because it completely deflects all UV rays.

Tom Hanes, a sophomore political science major who grew up in Miami, said, "Native Floridians are more conscious of protecting themselves from the sun.

"People are always asking me why I don't have a tan [and I tell them] I know about skin cancer," he said.

Extra protection is needed from the sun until the natural tanning process begins. Melanin, a brownish pigment, is a protein found in the skin that protects it from burning. Darker skinned people have more melanin, so they burn less easily. Sun rays increase the amount of melanin, and you get a tan.

Skin is more susceptible to burning if you are taking certain drugs, such as antibiotics or birth control pills. Read the labels on your prescription bottle carefully or ask your doctor for more information.

You may think you are safe on a cloudy day or in the water, but ultraviolet rays go through clouds and up to three feet of water. Beach umbrellas offer minimal protection because the rays deflect off the sand and water onto your body. Remember to protect your eyes with sunglasses, preferably wraparounds.

Senior journalism major Brooke Burton is going to West Palm Beach for Spring Break. She said she is buying the highest available sunblock protection possible because her father's once had an episode of skin cancer.

"I'd like to prevent [cancer] because I'm as pale as a ghost," she said.

If a sunburn does occur, keep skin cool with a cold compress or by soaking burned areas in water — even before it starts to hurt. Aspirin will help the pain and swelling, but creams and lotions may trap the heat.

Heat stroke and heat exhaustion are serious conditions that can happen if you're in the sun too long. Increasing liquids (except alcohol, which dehydrates the body) will help prevent further dehydration, and increasing salt will regulate the water balance in your body. Medical attention should be sought if the condition does not improve.

Keep in mind that skin cancer is the most common, and most preventable, form of cancer.

Another Spring Break topic is alcohol-related accidents. However, not all of them are cases of drunk driving. Drowning is the number one cause of recreational/accidental deaths. Australian researchers revealed that 35 percent of drowning victims were legally drunk.

Marlboro Man has lung cancer

By CECI CONNOLLY
Associated Press

BOSTON — A man who says he was the Marlboro Man has lung cancer. Winston's self-described "GI Joe action model" is paralyzed on one side, thanks to a stroke caused by smoking.

The two rugged men say they made big bucks "encouraging young people to smoke what we know kills people," as one put it.

But not any more. Now they're fighting for their lives and waging war on the tobacco companies they say nearly killed them.

"We are scams," former Winston cigarette man David Goerlitz told a group of children gathered at the Statehouse Wednesday. "We were used to trick you kids."

Goerlitz and Wayne McLaren, sporting a trademark 10-gallon hat, lobbied in favor of bills that would pay for anti-smoking education and preventive health programs with increased cigarette taxes.

Phillip Morris said Wednesday McLaren was never employed by the company or its advertising agency.

McLaren has appeared on several television programs in recent months, although he apparently did not provide any of his commercials or print ads. McLaren also said in sworn testimony that he posed as the smoking cowboy.

Flashing slides of glitzy magazine ads on a hearing room wall, the two men urged a group of school children not to be duped by advertising they say makes smoking appear fashionable.

In one ad, Goerlitz, looking handsome and fit, is crouched under an airplane wing lighting a cigarette, dangerously close to the plane's combustible fuel.

"The message is if you smoke, you can be macho and tough," he said.

For women and young girls, the ads portray "sexy, beautiful, glamorous" women, posed with cigarettes in hand.

"It's lies, kids," said Goelitz, a fast-talking, 42-year-old father of three. "I made $75,000 to $100,000 a year to make you kids confused.

"I'm not here to preach to you, I just want you to know these girls don't smoke," he said of the female models.

David Fishel, a spokesman for R.J. Reynolds, said the company targets adults who smoke other brands of cigarettes.

"Our appeal is to competitive smokers," he said. "We don't want kids to smoke."

But McLaren, 51, said children and adults do not realize the serious dangers posed by tobacco.

In two years of intensive treatment for his cancer, McLaren said every doctor told him the same thing: "All this pain and misery was brought to you by one thing — smoking."

Democratic legislative leaders used the hearing to attack Gov. William Weld, saying he promised to veto proposals to raise the cigarette tax by 13 cents to pay for new health care programs.

Massachusetts high school to attempt Saturday classes

HULL (AP) — About half of the freshman and sophomores at Hull High School say they'll go to school on Saturdays as part of a program to raise students' self-esteem, according to a survey.

The Hull School Committee Tuesday night unanimously approved a six-week trial of weekend classes that begins this weekend.

The six teachers who volunteered for the classes will be paid.

Student attendance will be voluntary. In a survey of 200 students, 95 said they would participate.

"This is a positive, forward-thinking, progressive idea," said Leonard Peters, School Committee chairperson.

"The great part about it is the teachers came up with the idea and the students went along with it."

School Superintendent Claire Cheff said the idea came from teachers who wanted to get students to achieve more in classes.

"It started because we want to try and raise the expectations of the kids, get them to work harder," she said.

"Kids don't do homework; they watch too much TV, and sometimes don't have the skills that they need."

Marylou Galuzzo, who teaches French and Spanish at the high school, proposed a Saturday workshop for students seeking extra help.

Cheff found money for the program from grants and savings from heating accounts. She said juniors and seniors at the school were disappointed they were not included.

The Saturday classes will be from 9 a.m. until noon with teachers giving formal instruction in different subjects. There will be a period of physical education, and officials are looking for money to offer breakfast.

Students in the two grades will attend on alternating weeks. Cheff said she hopes the program will increase students' confidence by giving them more skills and that if it succeeds, the money can be found to make it permanent.

"The kids really do care about their education," said Galluzzo. "I think the kids want to come because we have created an atmosphere that is really caring. It is a real pat on the back for the teachers."

UM students lobby in nation's capital

By GREG COOK
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students' requests for more financial aid were met with mixed reactions from legislators in the nation's capital last week.

The student group Students Advocating Financial Aid travelled to Washington to take part in the legislative process and lobby for congressional support for a financial aid package proposed recently on Capitol Hill.

Sophomore Dirk Hueglin, on exchange from the University of New Mexico, found the experience an eye opener.

"In a college environment we often get a cynical view of the government," Hueglin said. "The [SAFA] trip gave me a less biased perspective of our government. It's not quite the monster we often make it out to be."

SAFA members lobbied in congressional offices for three days.

Attessa Bagherpour, a senior resource economics major, found it "fascinating to see first-hand the inner workings of the legislative process."

SAFA representatives pressed several proposals, including possibly trading tax incentives for loan repayment or exchanging public service for loan forgiveness.

The Pell Grant entitlement program dominated the students' agenda. Entitlement would guarantee funding for all those eligible to receive it, much like Medicaid and Social Security.

Currently, qualification for the Pell Grant is no guarantee that a student will receive it.

The entitlement program, however, was not a topic well received by many of the legislators SAFA members met with.

"Very few of the congressmen agreed with entitlement," Bagherpour said. "They felt it would be too expensive, and take the power to control funds out of their hands.

According to Sean Porter, SAFA president and a junior history and political science major, "many congressmen argued that a new entitlement program would be added strain to an economy already under the strain of a recession and a growing national deficit.

"But if education is the priority most congressmen say it is, they need to find a way to fund this program," Porter added.

The Senate recently passed a large financial aid bill. The bill raised the maximum amount available to students receiving Pell Grants from $2,400 to $3,600. Furthermore, the bill increased Pell Grant eligibility to a greater portion of the middle class.

The bill, which originally contained entitlement, was passed without this program.

Besides entitlement, the majority of the students' requests were well received, according to members.

SAFA members said they returned to the university with a mixture of frustration, optimism and activism.

"While I feel like we made a difference, there are some high walls to climb before we really make headway, namely partisanism," Porter said, in reference to the strong Republican opposition to entitlement.

Bagherpour also felt the need for more action.

"I realized how imperative it is that people voice their opinions to their congressmen, so they vote for what their constituents want," she said.

Rev. Jackson joins protest at Harvard

By CHRIS TORCHIA
Associated Press

CAMBRIDGE — The Rev. Jesse Jackson told Harvard Law School students Wednesday they may have to go to jail in their struggle to get more minorities on the faculty.

Jackson called the protest against the law school's hiring decisions another step in the civil rights movement launched decades ago by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.

"That form of agitation helps to rouse people's minds," he said. "You must be prepared for litigation, for demonstration or even for jail."

Jackson's speech to about 500 students came as pressure mounted on the law school to change its hiring practices. A two-year-old lawsuit filed against the school by students reached the state's Supreme Judicial Court early this month.

To loud applause, Jackson said faculty hiring at the law school had links to the "disease" of racism fostered by President Bush and his Republican challengers.

"It sends a chilling message that gives aid and comfort to Bush and Buchanan and Duke," he said. "They couldn't do any different. It's beneath the dignity of Harvard's reputation."

Harvard Law has 64 tenured and tenure-track faculty, of whom six are Black men and five are women, school officials said.

Student activists say Harvard has no law professors who a Asian American, openly gay or women of color.

Jackson said Harvard Law School Professor Derrick Bell, who has vowed to remain off campus to protest the lack of minority faculty, ranked with King and Nelson Mandela in this dedication to equality.

Bell, 61, is in the second year of an unpaid leave of absence meant to symbolize his opposition to the law school's hiring decisions. Bell pledged to stay away, despite a policy that limits leaves to two

IRA political wing official calls for British withdrawal

By OLIVIA STEWART-LIBERTY
Collegian Staff

The general secretary of Sinn Fein proposed last night an alternative to the conflict which has devastated Ireland for more than 800 years: political and military withdrawal of the British from the six northern counties.

Lucillita Breatnach, of the political group working to rid Northern Ireland of British rule, said "In order to bring peace, one has to eradicate the causes of the war."

Breatnach said Britain refuses to leave Northern Ireland for two reasons, the first being that the six northern counties have "become a training ground for soldiers — on live targets" and the counties represent England's last remaining colony.

She said withdrawal would mean much foreign investment due to "rampant unemployment and cheap labor."

Sinn Fein is the politicial wing of the Irish Republican Army, although the Sinn Fein does not support terrorism.

The talk opened with a 30-minute video which documented the struggle in Ireland over the centuries, with an emphasis on the role of women. The documentary stated that in Ireland, before the onslaught of the British ("a barbarian, stiff-necked race"), women had enjoyed almost equal rights to those of men.

The documentary followed the British colonization from the end of the 15th century to present day, describing Ireland as a Third World country, the victim of genocide, famine and slavery.

The film stated that in the closing years of the 17th century, thousands of youths were sent into slavery by the British, describing the situation as "the world's first apartheid system, enacted by what British historians term their 'Glorious Revolution.' "

The film followed through into the 1800s when the potato blights of 1843 and 1846 wiped out a quarter of the population, "while Queen Victoria of England entertained on a grand scale," through to Bloody Sunday in 1972, when British parachuters killed 14 civilians who were involved in a non-violent demonstration.

Breatnach said that Sinn Fein is the only party in Ireland which operates on both sides of the border, in both Northern and Southern Ireland. She described the party as "the most victimized political party in the whole of Europe," saying that the president of the organization, along with many other party members including the co-speaker with whom Breatnach was originally scheduled to travel, have been denied access to the United states.

Breatnach also said Sinn Fein has been denied access to Irish National air waves, both in the north and south.

According to Breatnach, there are currently 30,000 British forces in Northern Ireland, which has a population of 1.5 million. She said the army on a "day-to-day basis" regularly conducts house arrests.

Breatnach described a house arrest, stating that between 200 and 300 armed officers with police will place a house arrest on 30 to 40 houses, in a single area. Resistance, Breatnach said, results in arrest or beating, while women may suffer sexual harrassment.

Breatnach spoke of the British repression of teenagers, citing the specific case of 16-year-old Damian Austen as an example, who was arrested and then released, "covered with cigarette burns."

Breatnach said last week, 21 women in a prison in Northern Ireland were strip searched, internally and externally. One woman is now in hospital, according to

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist, and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Won't they ever stop whining?

Certain people would have us believe that there is something glorious, possibly even divine, about being a woman. These individuals would also like very much to convince us that, as women of the '90s, they are subject to forms of oppression more heinous than those suffered by Blacks during slavery or Jews in Hitler's Germany. These haughty, hairy-legged vixens are likely to be spied in pseudo-subversive hot spots like Northampton's Haymarket Cafe, brooding over cups of herbal tea and muttering to themselves about "the patriarchy, dammit."

Robin Weaver

A person not of this breed may well wonder why they do it. The answer is that these women clearly have nothing better to do. If they had any real talents, skills or aspirations other than to irritate people, it seems only logical that they would be pursuing those things.

It generally happens that when this lack of creativity is combined with a certain arrogance, bordering on megalomania, the feminist is born. She chooses the most obvious and unimaginative aspect of herself in which to place all her energy: being a woman. In these enlightened times, one can even major in being a woman. It is incredible but true.

But why the relentless whining about oppression?

Anyone who stops to note the fact that nowadays any intelligent and driven woman has almost, if not exactly, the same chance as a man in realizing her dreams — a truly amazing thing if you look back even 40 years and compare our chances then and now — will see that the current feminist rhetoric is mostly a lot of hot, stale air. But, sadly, the feminist personality encompasses not only a creative vacuum and delusions of grandeur, but also a perverse need to complain. To complain constantly. In fact, excessive and self-indulgent complaining is one of the more unfortunate characteristics of women as a whole, politically correct or otherwise.

It is both fascinating and pathetic that nowadays vast numbers of women, particularly in college, are dedicating their minds and lives to the pursuit of glorifying their womanhood. They mourn the fact that some women still confine themselves to the traditional role of housewife and mother, and yet they limit themselves to playing out the feminist stereotype, wherein their gender is the only thing about themselves that interests them.

They seem strangely oblivious to the fact that there is a whole world out there waiting to be taken by storm by all of us, thanks to the efforts of the feminists of the '60s and '70s (and prior), the ones who actually had something real to complain about and who made possible our present liberation.

But today's new generation of feminists, largely bred by the virus of political correctness plaguing our nation's campuses, cannot concede that now the war is essentially won. Desperate to find an identity — as, granted, many young people are — they see one in the fashionable "struggle" to fight female oppression in the '90s. Feminism is a quick, ready-made identity for someone who can't uncover anything else interesting about herself to concentrate on developing.

Needless to say, I will never be among your ranks, "sisters", with your conspicuously make-up-free faces and your banshee-like voices and your formatted, platitude-drenched monologues. I have big dreams and big plans, and bitching about "the patriarchy" is definitely not among them.

SORRY, NO REFUNDS

Surprise! You're dead!

Have I got a story to share with you. By now, I am sure many of you are sick and tired of all the advice being thrown your way as you prepare to head off to some balmy area for Spring Break.

Constantly reminded, that "It's better to be safe than sorry," is solid advice, that as of late, is gaining national exposure.

Hearing warnings is one thing, but listening to a personal experience has a way of getting to the core a little quicker and with a bit more impact.

Felice Cohen

This story was told to me by a friend. Some of the details have been changed, but the message is the same. Hopefully at least some of you will retain a fraction of what you are about to consume. This is not brain surgery, but does involve a bit of common sense. So relax, take your time and don't forget to breathe. Here goes.

Meet Dave. Dave went to Daytona Beach for Spring Break with "the guys." They drove down together, each with their own expectations of the week ahead. Though for Dave in particular, this was going to be a very memorable week.

Now meet Julie. Julie also went to Daytona for Spring Break, though she went with "the girls." Julie and her friends were excited to finally be going down South, since they had been planning this trip for over a year. They could hardly wait.

When Dave and his friends arrived, they went right to the beach. Tearing off their clothes, they slapped on tanning oil and strutted down the shore in search of bikini-clad women.

After unpacking and choosing the right outfits, Julie and her friends also headed to the beach. Sunglasses in hand, they relaxed in the sand, soaked up the rays and checked out the men.

That is when Dave spotted Julie. Sitting among her friends, he approached her. They sat and talked for hours. Dave was excited to have caught a "babe" so quickly.

His friends had long since left, but Dave knew he'd meet up with them the next day. They were going out to the bars and would hardly miss him. Besides, Dave had much better plans for the evening, for he was sure he would not be returning to his hotel room that evening.

Julie was ecstatic. Here she was, in Florida only one day and had met a guy. He was polite and seemed genuinely interested in her as well. Not to mention he was a real "hunk."

Getting ready for the evening, Julie chatted with her friends about Dave. She was certainly looking forward to their evening together. Her plans for break had been to meet a guy and have fun with no strings attached. Her friends, preparing to go uptown, left Julie in high spirits. Heading to the bars to go dancing they hoped they'd get as lucky as Julie.

So went Spring Break and soon it was time for Dave and Julie to depart. Having "hooked up" for the week, they spent every waking (and non-waking) minute together. I won't go into details, but I will tell you this; Dave and Julie not only fulfilled their own expectations, but Julie would be returning with more than she bargained for. Both were satisfied to be leaving. They agreed it had been an incredible week filled with plenty of memories.

As they whispered their last goodbyes, Dave handed Julie a present. Wrapped in a box with a shiny bow, he said, "Don't open it until you get home." And with that, he gently kissed her on the lips, hopped into his car and drove away.

Arriving home, the first thing Julie did, was rip open the gift. She had no clue as to what she'd find, but assumed it would be something to remind her of their time in Florida. Something to capture their seven days together. Something that she'd never forget.

Well, at least Julie was half right. Opening the box, she froze. Inside the package was a simple, hand written note from Dave. Not a love poem, but definitely a long lasting, if not life lasting, reminder of their week together.

Holding the card in her numb hands, the words staring back at her expressionless face read, "Welcome to the wonderful world of AIDS."

Place more value on human life

I was at the Léon Bing assembly on March 9. One of the former gang members was asked what one can do to help the gangs in places like South Central Los Angeles. He answered with the question, "What can you do for another human being?" He wasn't talking about helping strangers on the other side of the country, he was talking about helping anyone that needs it.

At home, at work, on the sidewalk or anywhere, there are other human beings all around us who need a helping hand (but not necessarily a hand-out). He was talking about putting value on human life everywhere. I believe that we need to deal with everyone using a cool head and a warm heart. A cool head is one that does not allow sentimentality and empathy to overwhelm you and cloud your mind. A warm heart means not letting indifference be the way you deal with other people's feelings. It means you have to care — the toughest, most important thing you can do in your lives. Peace and be careful.

Memories of childhood

Childhood memories often include very special, magical moments that bring a sweet wisp of gentle melancholy to our hearts whenever we revisit them.

My fondest reveries are about the summers I spent on my grandpa's farm as a little girl. He farmed outside Lawrence, Kansas for over 50 years. He sold his farmstead and retired to Missouri while I was in junior high.

Trystan Skeigh

I remember rainy afternoons spent playing hide 'n' seek in the old white dairy barn with my cousins, exploring dusty cobwebbed nooks and climbing the bales stacked in the hayloft. When the little hen house was empty sometimes we'd play house, although our version was more like pioneers or early settlers.

In a small child's eyes a big farm holds so many wondrous things. The corn crib, with its shining yellow mounds of grain, made a great imaginary treasury — we'd laugh and jump into our plunder, playing King Midas and Richie Rich.

I used to stalk the wild barn kittens, determined to catch one. Once I actually succeeded, but it bit me and I dropped it. I gave up after that . . . Most of the kittens belonged to Betsy, a calico matriarch who was born the same time as my oldest cousin.

I can close my eyes and hear pigs clanking the metal lids on the corn feeders or feel the soft velvet muzzle of the Shetland pony named Midget he bought for us grandkids. I loved riding that stubborn little brown pony, even though she used to try to knock me off by running under tree branches or rubbing up against wooden fences. Riding her was always a battle of wills. Sugar cubes helped.

But my big strong Grandpa was the center of my little girl's heart. We were buddies — me trotting behind wearing one of his old John Deere caps — always wishing I could have overalls too.

He even used to let me drive the tractors, although to be really honest, all I did was steer. Only Grandpa's long legs could reach the pedals.

I picked up my avid love of fishing from him and Grandma. After chores we would take long cane poles and some worms we dug from a secret spot at the bottom of the cow lot where it never dried out — even during droughts. We'd catch blue gill, perch and channel cats off the old rickety dock that jutted out into the pond that formed after Kansas' Great Flood of 1951.

That year the Caw River overswelled its banks and flooded most of Lawrence. Grandpa's farm, only a mile from the riverbed, was submerged. When the water receded, he discovered the river had carved an underground channel through his potato field and formed a 65-foot deep farm pond loaded with fish. One of the neighbors used to tell me a story about a giant turtle, nearly as big as a good size pig, that crawled out onto the bank one day. I always hoped to glimpse this deep water denizen, but never did.

Looking back on those idyllic times I realize they instilled in me a deep love for farming. Family farmers are a special lot — a group of humble folks who work to break even, who value their freedom more than profit, and love the land more than anything.

Over Spring Break I'm flying home to Kansas. While there I'm going to visit my grandfather. He suffered a stroke last August and finally, after 80 years, has lost most of the physical strength that has kept him active since retirement, gardening and traveling. I hope while I'm home I can tell him how much he means to me, although I think he already knows. I want to let him know my idea of heaven still includes a big white barn, miles of golden wheat fields, a farm pond filled with perch and catfish, a little brown pony, and most of all, him.

Reluctant Republican settles for four more years of death

Between the two major parties, the race for the Republican presidential nomination has become by far the most interesting and the most ignored. Up for reelection is Desert Storm Master-of-Genocide, George Bush, who ended up fulfilling more of Michael Dukakis's campaign promises than his own.

It fails to make sense that we elected a conservative to enact liberal policies. To avoid electing the wrong people to do the right job again, we need to look at the whole picture to understand where the candidates stand and what they truly want. What are we going to get from the person we elect? Would the '88 election have been different if George Bush had campaigned as Texas oil-man and CIA Director instead of George Flag versus Willie Horton?

Challenger no. 1 was former Ku Klux Klan Grand Lizard David Duke, whose past speaks loud and clear as to where he really stands. He now denounces his Klan background , but his policies haven't changed. Large segments of the U.S. population who believe that White people are oppressed and discriminated against would be surprised to see their complaints echoes in David Duke. It would not be an overstatement to say that the majority of America would vote for Duke and his platform, but they do not wish to acknowledge their own sympathies for the Klan and racial hate. Therefore, Duke has been resigned for being the trial balloon for the Republican Party machine. It is now Duke's job to experiment with the viability of racist code words to use in the campaigns of Jesse Helms and George Bush.

To escape the stigma of Duke's past, the Republican Right produced as a replacement none other than Challenger no. 2, Patrick Buchanan. As Buchanan's resume is free of the stigma of "official" hate groups, he gets to spout even greater racist, anti-Semitic and homophobic hate, and get away with it.

The time has come to make the connections and to, as The New Republic said, stop letting Buchanan weasel out of specific comments and start looking at them as a whole. After we finish off Buchanan, we can then start to examine his subtler and more dangerous political cousins.

Peter J. Wagner

Fringe elements of the right like to call attention to Buchanan's opposition to the Gulf War as a distinction between him and Bush. The important question to ask, however, is: Why was he opposed to the war?

No, not because of some twisted John Birch Society idea that the New World Order is a socialist conspiracy. Rather, Buchanan claims that he opposed the war because the UN ordered the war. (Yo, Pat, wake up! Bush bought the UN, not the other way around.) He whines that Congress was not consulted. (Do you believe that President Buchanan would care about Congress?) He claims that he is for America First and isolationism. (Do you truly believe that US imperialism would end under Buchanan?)

The first step in analyzing Buchanan is to discuss his anti-Semitism, which is the first plank in his platform and, hopefully, the first nail in his casket. The real reason Buchanan opposed the Gulf War was because, in his warped view, the war was part of a Jewish conspiracy to support Israeli domination of the Middle East. The man that denies the deaths in the holocaust and calls Hitler "a man of great courage" should not be president. This modern "man of courage" wants to set up concentration camps for homosexuals. Buchanan would be thoroughly trounced to send a message to those who, no doubt, quietly support such hellish schemes (ie. Bush).

Just as Bush has acted in the interests of America's rich corporations, Buchanan would concern himself with a different sector of the American elite: Christian White men. Consider the agenda of each. Bush ignores the AIDS crisis; Buchanan contributes AIDS to God's revenge on homosexuals. I don't really think it matters who we vote for. All the candidates, especially those on the Republican side, are the same, just in different packages. The question remained as to the degree we want to see what we are getting into.

As a Republican (it's a long story, trust me), my choices were quite limited on Super Tuesday, unenrolled voters and Democrats had a larger selection. To those of you who voted with me in the Republican primary, the choice was clear: Vote for four more years of smooth-talking arrogance and death, or vote for one of the more overt racists, and pray that they incite an armed, Marxist revolution.

Local music scene is unhealthy

I am writing to dispel a rumor that the Pioneer Valley is a hot spot for local music, a great place to base your band, a scene comparable to Athens, Georgia or Seattle, Washington. Please take heed — this is not the case.

There are certainly plenty of groups in this area — that isn't the problem. I don't want to knock the bands — about 10 percent of this huge number is actually very worthwhile. This just isn't the place to "make it."

Sure, J. Mascis is from Amherst, but his band is not nearly as big in the Pioneer Valley as they are in other parts of the country or abroad. In fact, Sheehan's and Pearl St. banned Dinosaur Jr. for being too loud long before the band enjoyed any success. (And stop saying that Pixies are from UMass — they aren't. Charles "Black Francis" Thompson and Joey Santiago went here briefly and dropped out. They were briefly a Boston band, a different world all together.) Thing is, there aren't nearly enough venues here, right now they all seem to be booked through June and they are extremely wary of the "uncommon sound." Furthermore, the only publication in the area that writes about local music is this one, and this happens only once a week. I'm packing up my group and moving to New York this summer. Anywhere is better than here.

Japanese not to blame, we are

Recently, a University of Massachusetts student from Japan was coming out of Stop & Shop. A woman walked up to her and asked, "Are you from Japan?" She said "Yes." "Go home, Jap!" the woman said. The following day, this unfortunate student was looking at some jewelry she was interested in buying from one of those vendors in the Campus Center. The vendor asked if she was Japanese. He didn't want to sell to Japanese.

These people are fools. The woman who told the student to "go home" is a fool for trying to reduce the amount of out-of-state tuition that the University gets. We need every dollar we can get in these budget-strapped times. The vendor was a fool. No wonder we can't sell anything in Japan! We don't even want to sell them anything here!

Stupidity, combined with fear and prejudice, is dangerous. Leave the Japanese that live amongst us alone. Better yet, make them feel welcome and they may encourage more of their fellow countrymen and women to come. We need all the out-of-state tuition, in-state purchases and foreign investment they can bring.

While "American" manufacturers are laying off workers and preparing to move major portions of their industry to Mexico to take advantage of the expected "Free Trade Agreement," the Japanese are investing in America, hiring American workers and creating manufacturing jobs here. While General Motors has been laying off workers, Honda and Toyota have been hiring.

Save your anger for those who deserve it, the nearsighted American managers and financers, with their million dollar-plus paychecks, golden parachutes and government-subsidized financial scams and the politicians and administrators more concerned with their welfare than ours.

Don't let them touch Roe v. Wade

This is a call to action to pro-choice students and community members. It's time to organize and harness our voices into one huge roar — "We won't go back!"

On April 5, there will be a rally and march in Washington to tell George Bush and his conservative coalition of judicial moralists that women will never go back to the days of back alleys and coat hangers. Never again will we bleed to death at the mercy of a butcher or writhe in the pain of a tragic infection.

Roe v. Wade is due for review this summer, as states throughout the country draft the strictest abortion laws since its decision. A woman's right to choose what happens to her body and her life is in the hands of an anti-woman, "pro-family" Supreme Court which, judging from precedent, will almost definitely take it away. This is a state of emergency for women, and it is crucial that we act.

In memory of our sisters who died at the hands of oppression, in rage against the trends which threaten us again, I call on you to make the difference. We are the majority, and we will never go back.

Notes from the Campus Center basement

Finally, a chance to write the Notes! I feel so fulfilled. Editorial positions and a portrait of myself on the sports page were nice, but the Notes. . .

If those are prophylactics, it must be Spring Break: On my way to the Bluewall I noticed the Not Ready For Bedtime Players had a display table set up. They were handing out condoms and dental dams (they're not just for dentists anymore!) to keep fun 'n' sun loving UMass hedonists from contracting all sorts of lovely sexually transmitted diseases.

Not like I have much use for them, even if one of them was mint-flavored. Not exactly my idea of "pure chewing satisfaction." Anyway, Betsy and friends have the right idea. If you're going to "cray-zay" in Daytona, stay sober and be careful.

"Did you know" department: Did you know the University's athletic teams were almost known as the "Artichokes?"

When the really, really offensive "Redmen" moniker was dropped in the early 1970s, a referendum was held to rename the mascot. Yes, the green, spiny, full of Vitamin A artichoke nearly beat out the current "Minutemen" to represent this fine school.

Only at UMass. Only at a school where the library wasn't built to hold books and windows in classrooms don't open. It's kind of like the Island of Misfit Toys from the Claymation classic Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer. You know, "A train with square wheels!"

Get Smart: That's a good bit of advice for Amherst beverage management activist Margot Parrot, who, according to my sources, was seen again lurking in the shrubbery near uptown bars. I mean, I'm glad she's concerned and all, but enough already.

Greg Sukiennik

People I know at other schools are incredulous about Parrot's ongoing research. When I explain the situation, they don't believe it's true until the third time I tell the story.

"You're kidding!" they say. "Doesn't she have a life?"

Say Cheese: Have you ever seen the ads for those really cheesy ice shows where nine-foot-high cartoon characters skate around a hockey arena to the "Up With People" soundtrack? This is culture? This is entertainment? This is stupid.

You wanna do something nice for your kids? Take 'em to a Metallica concert. They'll appreciate that. Why bother with "Peter Pan" or "Simpsons on Ice" when you can treat the young 'uns to "Enter Sandman" or "Sad But True" at obscenely loud volume? "Sleep with one eye open. . ."

While the nation finally gets a chance to see Curry Hicks Cage on prime time tonight, Mullins Arena, the future home of UMass Monster Truck Challenge, is cruising along on the schedule to being finished. Bigger and newer are better in this case, to be sure — witness the Tuesday night rush for tonight's tickets — but you can't replace a place like the Cage. Forty minutes of basketball will convince everyday fans at home just how special the place is. Even if paint does fall off the ceiling.

Let's see how many of my professors read this newspaper. Some I know do; how about the rest of you?

For the last time: Jim, the writer of "Jim's Journal," is not a Collegian employee but a syndicated cartoonist. Word has it Jim is just like his cartoon character in real life.

Of course, no installment of the Notes would be complete without at least some reference to The Minuteman.

There. That's better.

Anyone who comes back from break with a tan has to deal with me. Anyone who went to a tanning booth needs even more help.

Paul Tsongas is for nuclear power, huh? Wonder if he went through radiation therapy at all. Hey Paul, for a fun swim, how about the coolant pond at Yankee Rowe?

Mullins Arena may not have money to operate

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

As construction of the Mullins Memorial Center arena project nears completion, questions are being raised as to where the money will come from to operate the $50 million facility when it opens as expected next year.

"The building has no source of operating money for it," said David Bischoff, dean of the School of Physical Education, adding that "a lot of avenues are being explored" for funding.

Bischoff said it's "improbable" that the many functions of the multi-purpose arena would be limited once it opens on the expected target date of Feb. 1, 1993.

A $100 fee will be instituted next semester and tagged onto the student mandatory fees for the next 30 years to pay back bond issues for the arena, he said.

"We've tried to be up-front and open about this fee. It was fully discussed," Bischoff said. "For the size of the facility, it's a huge bargain."

At a Faculty Senate meeting last month, even Chancellor Richard O'Brien was unsure where the source of money supporting the maintenance of the 10,000 seat arena would come from.

"The Chancellor is absolutely right," said Ashoke Ganguli, director of Auxiliary Services. "Will we have the money to keep the place going?"

Ganguli said the utility bill for Mullins will be $750,000 a year, for example.

"Overall, it's a fantastic asset to the campus but I wish the governor would give money for funding that building."

Michael Melnick, program director for the Mullins Arena project, said the arena will definitely be ready for use next spring.

"It's going to get funded," Melnick said. "Do you think someone is going to put out $50 million and not heat the building?"

Melnick said the funding for the operation of Mullins is a "given" — the source is "going to come from somewhere."

"The building is going to be beautiful," said Ganguli on the arena which will be able to accommodate athletics, conventions, trade shows, theatre productions and concerts.

The University is presently searching for a private "management expertise" contractor to maximize the financial potential of the building, Ganguli said.

Bischoff said the initiative to build an arena came from legislators, alumni and other outside supporters. He said the funds to construct Mullins were appropriated in 1988.

The state legislator gave the University about $25 million, or about half of the cost. The University Building Authority is raising the remaining cost.

In short, Bischoff said the University needed the money up front to pay the contractor so they went to bondholders for loans. The additional $100 students will have to pay will be earmarked for the payback of these loans.

"We're getting a $50 million facility for $25 million," Bischoff said. "It's a bargain."

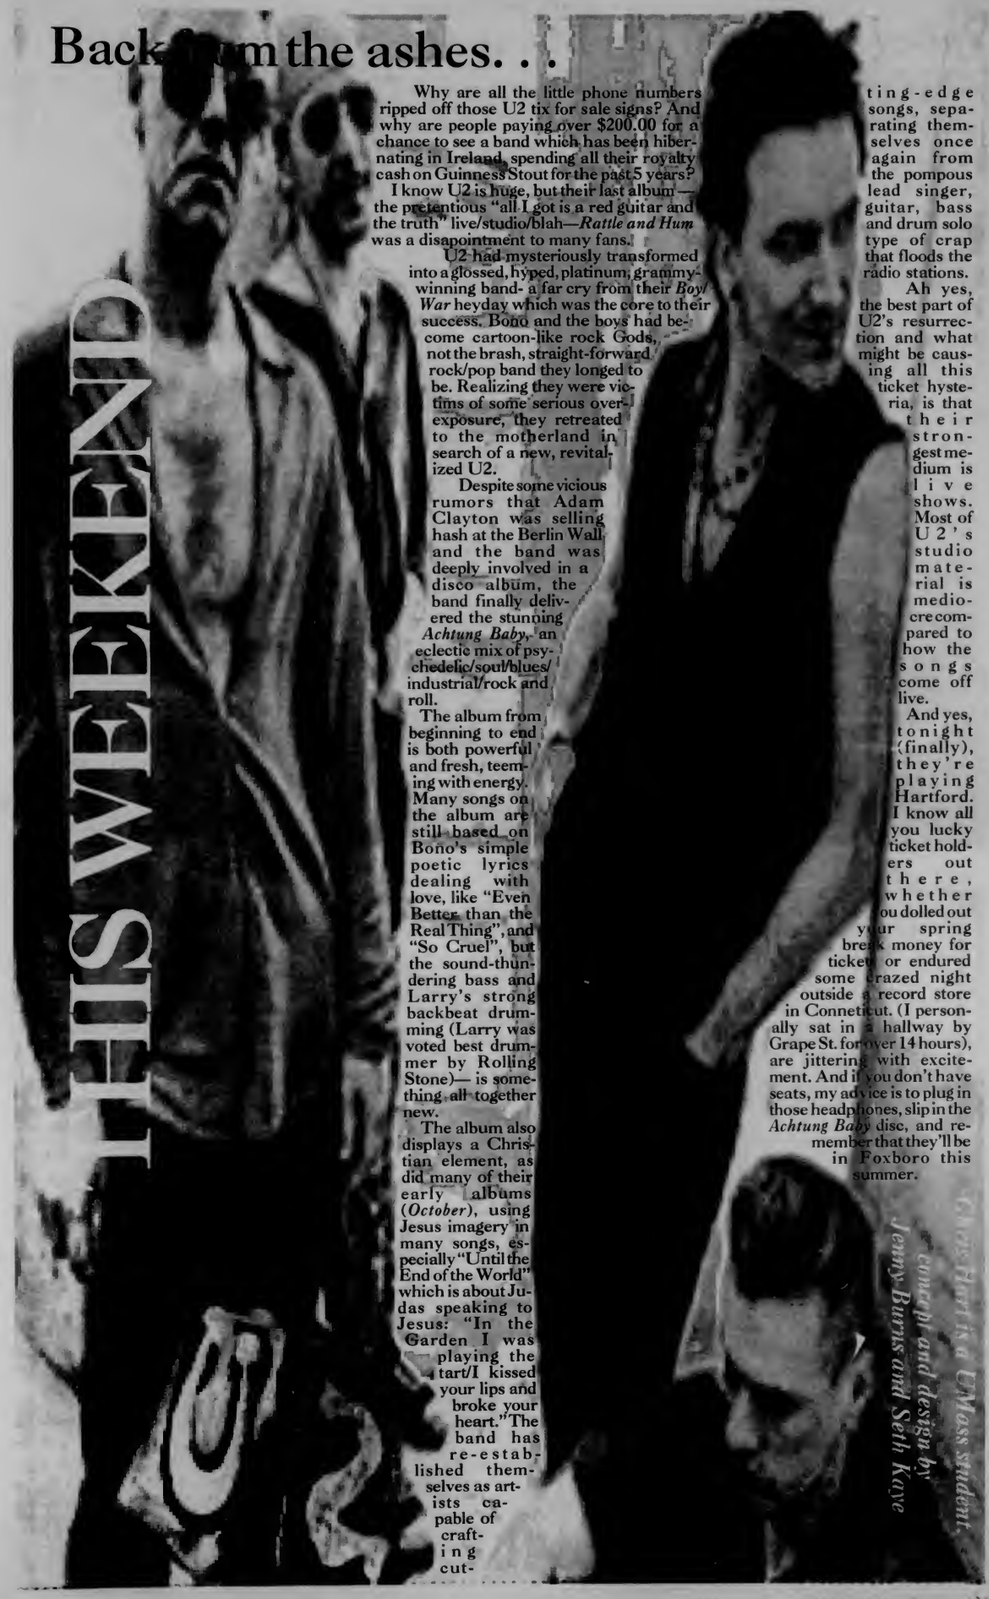
Back from the ashes. . .



Why are all the little phone numbers ripped off those U2 tix for sale signs? And why are people paying over $200.00 for a chance to see a band which has been hibernating in Ireland, spending all their royalty cash on Guinness Stout for the past 5 years?

I know U2 is huge, but their last album — the pretentious "all I got is a red guitar and the truth" live/studio/blah—Rattle and Hum was a disapointment to many fans.

U2 had mysteriously transformed into a glossed, hyped, platinum, grammy-winning band- a far cry from their Boy/War heyday which was the core to their success. Bono and the boys had become cartoon-like rock Gods, not the brash, straight-forward rock/pop band they longed to be. Realizing they were victims of some serious overexposure, they retreated to the motherland in search of a new, revitalized U2.

Despite some vicious rumors that Adam Clayton was selling hash at the Berlin Wall and the band was deeply involved in a disco album, the band finally delivered the stunning Achtung Baby, an eclectic mix of psychedelic/soul/blues/industrial/rock and roll.

The album from beginning to end is both powerful and fresh, teeming with energy. Many songs on the album are still based on Bono's simple poetic lyrics dealing with love, like "Even Better than the Real Thing", and "So Cruel", but the sound-thundering bass and Larry's strong backbeat drumming (Larry was voted best drummer by Rolling Stone)— is something all together new.

The album also displays a Christian element, as did many of their early albums (October), using Jesus imagery in many songs, especially "Until the End of the World" which is about Judas speaking to Jesus: "In the Garden I was playing the part/I kissed your lips and broke your heart." The band has re-established themselves as artists capable of crafting cutting-edge songs, separating themselves once again from the pompous lead singer, guitar, bass and drum solo type of crap that floods the radio stations.

Ah yes, the best part of U2's resurrection and what might be causing all this ticket hysteria, is that their strongest medium is live shows. Most of U2's studio material is mediocre compared to how the songs come off live.

And yes, tonight (finally), they're playing Hartford. I know all you lucky ticket holders out there, whether you dolled out your spring break money for tickets or endured some crazed night outside a record store in Connecticut. (I personally sat in a hallway by Grape St. for over 14 hours), are jittering with excitement. And if you don't have seats, my advice is to plug in those headphones, slip in the Achtung Baby disc, and remember that they'll be in Foxboro this summer.

Valley is virtual fun house for Spring Break

By BRIAN HARRINGTON
Collegian Staff

If you're sticking around the Happy Valley this weekend, don't despair.

There is still plenty of good music to see this Saturday night even if the campus is closed and all your friends have gone off to warm and sunny climates.

Very few local bands ever gain the distinction of signing a major label's recording contract and getting a legitimate shot at the big time. The Sighs are just such a band, and they are poised for national exposure and success after years of paying their dues in local venues and regional clubs.

The group has just recently returned to this area after putting the finishing touches on the debut album they recorded in L.A. at the close of last year. There is no definite date set for the album's release, but the Sighs are restraining their excitement and keeping themselves busy in the meantime doing club dates.

This Saturday, the Sighs will be appearing at Pearl St. Nightclub in Northampton. Now is your chance to see one of this area's top professional acts before they embark on bigger and better things. This is definitely one of those bands you may be talking about years from now — that you saw them "way back when." The Sighs perform straight ahead rock and roll with a punch. There isn't one flaw in this band's veneer.

Now for something completely different. How about a lesbian and gay country-western band? We're talking about the Desperados, a new local outfit that certainly puts a twist on a traditional theme.

Country and western music is growing by leaps and bounds across the country, so why not country music by and for the lesbian and gay community?

The Desperados will be bringing "the lesbian and gay brand of country" to the People's Institute on Gothic Street in Northampton this Saturday night. The show begins at 8 p.m. and lasts until midnight. The event includes basic two step and line instruction for all you city slickers. Bring your partners and don't forget to wear your boots and denim for this one. There is a $5 fee at the door.

If alternative folk is your thing then why not go see Flower-Thief, an all-women trio that weaves elements of folk, punk and classical music into catchy original compositions and well blended vocal harmonies. The group consists of Christine Geisler on acoustic guitar and vocals, Jenn Gallahorn on electric bass and vocals, and Catherine McRae on violin. Gallahorn and Geisler have been best friends and writing songs together since childhood. Catherine plays the devil out of that violin.

They list influences ranging from Husker Du to the Velvet Underground and the group doesn't like to be pegged into any particular niche. Flower-Thief has performed on multiple bills and opened shows for many diverse acts.

"Everything from solo folk acts to hardcore bands" says Jenn.

The trio recorded a four song EP album last December which is now available at area retail outlets. It is a fine recording that highlights their beautiful voices, witty lyrics and accomplished musicianship. Everything just meshes together wonderfully on this cassette, from diverse styles and influences to harmonies and arrangements.

All three women are students at area colleges. Geisler and McRae attend Smith and Gallahorn goes to Hampshire. This weekend marks their first local appearance since returning to school last month.

Worth mentioning is the ambitious tour of the South that the group embarked on over their winter break. The self-promoted tour included stops at clubs in cities such as Athens, Memphis, Little Rock and New York City.

They have a demonstrated knack for transforming goals into reality through hard work and sharing. Manager Aimee Swift is a silent yet relentlessly active fourth partner who has played a key role in the cohesion and success of the band.

Flower-Thief will be the featured artist at the Fools Cafe held in the Unitarian Society at 220 Main St. in Northampton. The show is this Saturday and begins at 9 p.m. The group will be selling their new cassette at the show along with really cool T-shirts. There is no cover.

'Make It' just doesn't

"Make It Happen"
Ultra Magnetic M.C.'s
Mercury Records

In rap music, there is a proliferation of raps that dis "Sucker M.C's", but you rarely hear the sucker m.c.'s themselves.

That is until you've heard "Make It Happen" by the Ultra Magnetic M.C.'s.

"Make It Happen" is probably the cheesiest rap song that a person could ever hear. Accentuating the positive, the beat is funky, although it was sampled (ripped off) from "Hustle With Speed Taurus Aries and Leo" by J. Brown, a real musician. And that is probably the best thing said about the single.

PolyGram Records, while stupid for signing these pseudo-rappers, were smart for not promoting the whole album, but simply distributing the single.

Any rap whose second line ends, "I'm fresh, so fresh so fresh so fresh" is extremely weak.

My favorite line was "Does a dog have four legs, two ears, a nose and a mouth?" The reviewer probably wasted more time on this review than the group spent thinking up the rap.

The only thing close to this awful song was possibly the weakest Vanilla Ice rap on "To the Extreme".

While the song is utterly horrible, after the "dog" line it gets better. The rest of the song is mediocre, which is an improvement.

Can anyone make a fortune recording crappy rap albums? Whoever signed the Ultra Magnetic M.C.'s and let this single see the light of day should probably sweep streets or work in an accounting office.

As for the Ultra Magnetic M.C.'s, they too should try other avenues of employment, like volunteer work. As far as a long-term occupation, they'd probably make more money then through the rap industry.

Oh, in case you would like to pay money for the album, its name is Funk Your Head Up. Those with strong stomachs or a morbid curiosity are encouraged to check it out.

U2's tickets are overpriced

The other day in one of my classes this pseudo-hip charlatan that I'm barely acquainted with sauntered up to me full of teeth and beamed, "Kes, I've been fortunate enough to come across a suit of U2 memorandum."

"What?" I chided.

"I've got U2 tickets," he replied in the clear English that was so noticeably absent from his previous banality.

Scott Kesner

"How much?" I dared. My good friend benevolently resounded "I'll give you these tickets for the low, low price of $100." I asked him why I should pay that price.

He subtly stated, "This is a small price to pay to witness live the band that has transcended their timeless monumental soundscapes to millions of ecstatic listeners. Bono is God! His lyrics have more spiritual insight than a priest's sermon."

His picturesque rhetoric did not impress me but rather mesmerized me with disdain. I did not want to listen his pretentious praising any longer, so I put his offer off simply by saying, "I'll think about it."

So, I thought about the fortune asked for the U2 tickets and conducted a little retrospective of my previous concert goings. I've gotten to see the perspiration trickle down the chrome dome of Midnight Oil's monumental Peter Garrett. I applauded Sting's bare chest when he decided it was time to put down the bass and get fleshy.

Pat Metheney, a jazz/fusion musician who attended and practiced his guitar eight hours a day at Berklee School of Music dazzled me with his melodic blaze in front of a small audience. I've witnessed the former art rock icon, Peter Gabriel, turned experimental and Genesis, his former band, turn lousy. Jane's Addiction treated me to the finest catharsis possible and Pink Floyd widened my eyes with the brighest of laser shows.

I've seen over 70 shows, and I've never payed more than $25 for a ticket. U2 must be pretty fantastic to have fans willing to sell their TVs in order to salvage cash for a ticket. Well, save your cash folks, because they're not.

U2 has some pretty cool tunes and with the inventive hands of production guru's Steve Lillywhite and Brian Eno, they've coined a sound. Why go see them live though? I asked myself this question after attending one of their concerts from the "Joshua Tree Tour."

The music of U2 as a live outfit barely resembles the production clad one of the studio. In the studio, the musical parts fit together like a rare machine. However, when left on stage with merely their instruments, U2 is found swimming in a sea of retarded musical ability and Bono is the life guard.

Bassist Adam Clayton is a tad better than the Sex Pistol's Sid Vicious. If Sid hadn't taken all of those mind-altering drugs, I may not be able to make that claim. Drummer Larry Mullen Jr. who has recently been used minimally in favor of a more inventive drum machine, was always functional at best. Guitarist, the "Edge," also performs perfunctory. He survives by endlessly rehashing the sound Pink Floyd guitarist pioneered in the 70s. As far as versitility is concerned, this band has none. They're incapable of backing even Vanilla Ice.

Led Zeppelin had the propensity to experiment live with their tunes because their members were so well versed musically. James Brown got hot and sweaty while gyrating and his crowd spurred to abandon and followed. U2 shows rely too heavily on Bono's overwrought diatribes and epic harangues to elicit faux emotions from the crowd.

I hear that on this tour they will exempt their basic kinetic classics, "Sunday Bloody Sunday," and "I Will Follow." In their place will be a batch of tunes from the Joshua Tree, Rattle and Hum and the production-laden Achtung Baby. This should make for a brooding set of vapid dirges. Well I've made my decision about the ticket price and I'd like to pass on my advice to those of you still waiting in the wings for a ticket:

Don't pay more than $6.50 for a ticket.

Spring Break comes to you

By CHRIS SHADOIAN
Collegian Staff

Spring Break officially begins this Friday night, but I'm not going to Florida, Mexico or Jamaica.

I'm going to Springfield.

Specifically, I'm going to the premier show of the 1992 Bud Light Comedy Series at Springfield Symphony Hall. The show features Fox television's Shawn Wayans and Jamie Foxx from In Living Color, along with eight other comedy stars, four of whom are from western Massachusetts.

You're probably thinking:

"So how much does THAT cost? $20, $30, $40?"

Not even close. If your financial situation is anything like mine, I know you're stuck up North; trapped in the cold, dreary weather (just like me).

But for a measly $10 or $14 you can get a veritable vacation of comedy. Ten (count 'em) comedians for, at the most, $14. That works out to $1.40 a comedian! What a deal!

Besides, even if they aren't ALL funny, there should be a couple that'll be great. You know what I mean — you'll leave Symphony Hall and your stomach muscles will hurt (a workout, too!)

Unfortunately, I've never seen the feature performers Wayans or Foxx in a stand-up situation, so I can't say for sure how funny they'll be. But I watch In Living Color religiously, and any one who can act as funny as either Wayans or Foxx must be hilarious doing stand-up.

This is their first season as featured "players" on Color, but Wayans had been the show's D.J. (S.W. 1) during the previous two seasons, and has been in several movies, including brother Keenen Ivory Wayans' movie spoof, I'm Gonna Git You Sucka!.

Foxx, on the other hand, had to work hard for his job on Color. He managed, somehow (probably because he's really funny), to beat out 250 other comedians and actors for the role.

The other eight comedians include The Great Kris Kringle, Lenny Varnedoe, Kenny Williams and Pete Michaels along with his sidekick/ventriloquist dummy, "Woody D." All of them have appeared regularly at such famed comedy clubs as the Improv, Catch a Rising Star, Comic Strip and Dangerfield's.

The remaining four comics are from the local Western Massachusetts area. Comedians Mark Rossi, Barbara Jurgelas, John Kawie and Amherst's own Steve Bulyga, will be competing during the show for a highly cherished spot on "Showtime at the Apollo," so they'll all be at their best. The audience's reaction to their performances in

Mr. Lupo cries after Once Upon a Crime

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

These are the lean months for Hollywood. The big guns of the holiday season have died down and now its just a waiting game for the summer blockbusters, which include "Batman Returns," "Alien 3" and "Lethal Weapon 3" (hey, do I sense a pattern here?). So now is the time to release the studios' clunkers. Fitting the criteria are two new releases that make me anxiously await another sequel summer all the more.

Once Upon A Crime: What do you get when you lump a slew of B movie actors together, add on a couple of international stars, send them to a classy European locale and throw in a dash of mistaken identity and murder? Hopefully, you don't get "Once Upon A Crime," a witless, pathetic mystery comedy set in Monte Carlo that is so unfunny I wanted to cry.

SCTV alumnus Eugene Levy directs a busload of has-beens (Cybill Shepard, John Candy, Sean Young, George Hamilton and James Belushi) as well as noted actors from abroad (Giancarlo Giannini and Omella Muti) in this truly horrible film that fails at being both a lighthearted mystery or a screwball comedy.

The plot (too confusing; no, make that too stupid) to mention here involves a bunch of people running around Monte Carlo, all accused of the murder of a woman who left her inheritance to her dog.

There's the struggling actor (Lewis), his bickering partner in crime (Young), another bickering husband and wife (Shepard and Belushi) and well, another bickering couple (Candy and Muti). You can see the screenwriters had a lot of imagination. There's also a philandering playboy (Hamilton — who else?) and an intrepid Inspector (Giannini) trying to find out who did it. Everyone gets their chance to yell, run and try to be wacky and zany (in fact, they practically hit you over the head with it.)

The actors look sad, as though they just realized how low they've sunk. Richard Lewis elicits some laughs, but you can tell he made them up himself; the script isn't nearly as witty.

Just say "No" to "Once Upon A Crime."
Grade: D-

Gladiator: Despite those obnoxious commercials, "Gladiator" is deceptively effective. It's one of those movies you hate to admit you even slightly enjoyed.

James Marshall (Twin Peaks) plays Tommy Riley and Cuba Gooding Jr. (Boyz N the Hood) plays Lincoln, two fighters who are drawn into the illegal world of amateur boxing. Aided by a sleazy promoter (Brian Dennehey), the two friends are pitted against each other for, you guessed it, The Big Fight.

Nothing in this film is new, in fact, it blatantly lifts material off of other movies. But what it has that most other boxing ripoffs don't is solid, tough performances and some of the most energetic fighting scenes since the original Rocky.

Marshall provides an interesting center, partly because he plays Tommy not as a wishy-washy underdog but as a no-nonsense fighter with an attitude. Gooding adds slight dimensions to his stock character and Dennehey brings sleaziness to new heights (or lows).

"Gladiator" is by no means a great movie. The film is a packaged product for its audience — testosterone practically oozes out of this movie. Strictly for that audience, "Gladiator" aspires to be nothing more. Grade: C+

Get ready for the Mighty Bosstones at Pearl St.

By ERIC POULIN
Collegian Staff

Writing for the Arts and Living page, I've been to a lot of shows, seen many bands, and listened to several tapes, but the best performance I've witnessed came on a frigid Thursday evening last December. The place was Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton, and the band was none other than the Mighty Mighty Bosstones.

I'd enjoyed their debut album, Devil's Night Out (Taang! Records), and I was looking forwards to the show, but there was no way that I was prepared for what was about to transpire. The Mighty Ones ripped through a set of driving, thrashing ska (if you can even call it that), that brought this writer, along with his argyle socks and sore ankle, into the middle of the mosh.

Needless to say, their albums don't hold a candle to their live show, which isn't to say that a Bosstones tape is a bad investment. They're currently on the road to support their new album, More Noise and Other Disturbances, which was finally released in late January after a short delay. The single from the disc is an excellent song called "Where'd You Go?" — probably the most ska-flavored song they've ever done. It was released on a diskette along with covers of "Sweet Emotion," "Enter Sandman," "Ain't Talkin' 'Bout Love," and a re-recording of their original "Do Something Crazy."

The group is led by frontman Dicky Barrett, whose voice sounds like it was developed by gargling broken glass and washing it down with Jack Daniels. It's been paralleled to the vocals of Motorhead mainstay Lemmy Kilmister, which seems to be relatively accurate. Legend also has it that there is nary an Irish tavern in Boston that old Dicky hasn't gotten booted out of, which could quite possibly be the inspiration for "The Bartender's Song" ("what's this all about?/ after a couple, they usually throw me out.")

Although Barrett always seems to grab the spotlight, the other seven Bosstones are most certainly worth noting, for, without them, plaid jackets and Chuck Taylors wouldn't be nearly as fashionable.

Guitarist Nate Albert started out with the Bosstones at the tender age of fourteen, and is now considered one of Boston's finest axe men. He's best known for his ability to switch from the chinka-chinka sound of ska to loud, powerful thrash chords, into a killer solo, and, finally, back to where he started from. A quick listen to the title track from Devil's Night Out probably showcases this ability the best, as the transition is from MOD thrash to Madness ska at the drop of a Red Sox cap.

Joe Gittleman, the bass fiddleman, along with drummer Joe Sirois round out the rhythm section. Bosstone Ben Carr definitely serves his purpose (although we're not quite sure what it is, yet.) His job is to sing backup, dance up a storm, and make sure that everything runs smoothly. Everyone knows that they wouldn't be the Bosstones without him, although no one's quite sure why.

The guys that I really should pay homage to are Tim Burton and the "Hurtin' for Certain" horn section. They (with Burton on sax, Dennis Brockenborough on trombone, Kevin Lenear on sax, and Paul Burton on trumpet) are the unit that give the Mighty's their unmistakably big sound, and put them well above the moshing pack. They make the whole thing danceable, without losing any of the raw, driving thrash.

Yeah, I know that the game's tonight, and it's one of the biggest deals that this school has seen in a while, but if you're one of the unfortunates who couldn't get tickets (like me), why not bop down to check out the Mighty Mighty Bosstones. Believe me, the energy that they put out on stage is enough to make the trip worth your while. Besides, if Donta Bright eventually commits to UMass, there'll be plenty of Atlantic 10 championships on their way after this year.

The Mighty Mighty Bosstones will perform an 18+ show at Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton tonight. The show is upstairs, doors open at 7:00 p.m., and Not Our Dog will be the opening act.

Shabba Ranks 'as raw as ever'

SHABBA RANKS

By ERIC POULIN
Collegian Staff

Granted, a lot of you will be well on your way to warmer climates by the time Sunday rolls around, and most of you who aren't going away for Spring Break probably won't be in the area anyway. But, for those of you who are, Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton has reeled in another can't-miss artist: raggamuffin reggae king Shabba Ranks.

Even if you're predominantly unfamiliar with his work, you've undoubtedly heard his Top Five R & B smash hit "Housecall," which was recorded with fellow Jamaican star Maxi Priest. That single is off of his Epic Records debut, As Raw As Ever, the album that has exposed Shabba's music to a more mainstream and widespread assortment of listeners.

Along with the Top-40 "Housecall," the album also features "Trailor Load A Girls," the first single which has a video that was conceived and directed by Fab 5 Freddy and "The Jam", and was directed and collaborated with KRS-One of Boogie Down Productions.

Shabba's first single was released when he was only 14 years old, and the young MC quickly became the talk of all of Jamaica. "Heat Under Sufferer's Feet" was the name of the song, released under the name Co-Pilot. He explains: "there were four of us MCs working with Roots Melody Sound System: Admiral Bailey, Clement Irie, Kibba Ranks, and myself. I was number two man, so I took the name Co-Pilot."

The teenage wonder would continue to release many independant-label hits throughout the 1980s, culminating with the '89 monster (U.S./Caribbean smash hit "Wicked In Bed." He also guest-rapped on Scritti Politti's cover of the Beatles' "She's A Woman," which became a U.K. Top 20 hit.

"Some people say that I'm slack [expletive]," says Shabba. "Please don't judge me by one side of my music. Listen to the clean and the X-rated alike, and give me my just rewards. I'm like a coin — Shabba Ranks is not one-sided!"

Shabba Ranks will perform Sunday evening at Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton. Doors open at 8:30, and the show is 18+.

U.N. council admonishes Iraqi leaders

By VICTORIA GRAHAM
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. Security Council today castigated Iraq for defying its Gulf War cease-fire terms on disarmament, and the U.S. ambassador accused Iraqi leaders of playing "a game of cat and mouse."

The session was a rare, public dressing-down of a government official, Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz, who sought the meeting in order to make Iraq's case for easing tough economic sanctions. Aziz was to deliver an address after all 15 council members had spoken.

President Bush told reporters today at the White House that Iraq must comply with U.N. demands to scrap its nuclear, chemical and biological weapons program or face unspecified consequences.

"It is in their interest to comply with the resolutions, and if they don't comply we will contemplate all alternatives," said Bush, who ordered the invasion that ultimately led to the allies' 1991 victory over Iraq in the Persian Gulf conflict.

Pickering told the council that "Iraq continues to try to deceive and evade."

The U.S. envoy said Iraq has repeatedly lied about its nuclear, chemical, biological and ballistic weapons programs and still is concealing material.

"The pattern has continued right down to the present day," Pickering said. "This is not compliance. It is a game of cat and mouse, cheat and deceit."

Council President Diego Arria, the ambassador of Venezuela, delivered a 10-page indictment of Iraq's numerous cases of non-cooperation, but noted instances of cooperation in some weapons destruction operations and other areas.

The Arria statement, approved by the entire council, also cited human rights abuses, that despite the [demands for humane treatment], "the government of Iraq continues to perpetrate against its population," he said, condemning Baghdad's economic blockade against the Kurds.

Arria concluded "that Iraq has not fully complied with the obligations placed upon it by the council," and repeated an earlier council warning of "serious consequences" if Baghdad continues to refuse full cooperation.

Aziz was expected to argue that the sanctions should be eased as Iraq satisfies various demands, from destruction of Iraq's sophisticated weaponry to payment of reparations and ending the blockade of rebellious Iraqi Kurds.

Iraq's Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz, left, meets with U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali at the United Nations Tuesday. Saddam Hussein's top diplomat called for a end to U.N. economic sanctions against Iraq and denied his country is defying the United Nations' orders to disarm.

Gay activists allowed in parade

By TONY ROGERS
Associated Press

BOSTON — A judge ruled Wednesday a gay pride group can march in a traditional St. Patrick's Day parade, rejecting a ban by parade sponsors who feared the group would disrupt the event.

Suffolk Superior Court Judge Hiller Zobel said the activists had given adequate assurances that they would not present a threat to the parade. The gay rights group agreed to limit the number of participants to 25, carry only one banner and not distribute fliers or other materials.

The parade's sponsors said they would abide by the ruling.

"They don't want to create any more hard feelings. We don't want to foment difficulty between these two groups," said Chester Darling, an attorney for the South Boston Allied War Veterans Council that sponsors the March 15 parade.

The Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Pride Committee filed suit Tuesday, the morning after the veterans council voted to block the group from marching.

Lawyers for the activists said the parade in South Boston receives about $8,000 in city money and is, in effect, a public event and open to all.

But Darling charged that the gay Irish group's leader, Barbra Kay, didn't tell parade organizers she was a member of the group Queer Nation, which staged a protest during a January visit to Boston by New York Cardinal John O'Conner.

"That [Irish gay] group may include participants from that protest," Darling told Zobel. "If they are recognized, it will be lights out. . . all hell will break loose."

Kay said she had been up front about her membership in Queer Nation, which has a reputation for high-profile demonstrations, but said it was not affiliated with the Irish gay group.

Kay also said the activists don't plan to disrupt the parade.

"This is their attempt to get the focus off why they're denying us the right to march," Kay said. "This is a bigger issue than one group marching in a parade. It's a fight for our rights."

Zobel, quoting Thomas Jefferson, said the right to peaceably assemble includes the right to express unpopular views in a peaceful manner.

"There are certain constitutional themes that run throughout our history to such a degree that they are part of our fabric," Zobel said. "One of those is the right of peaceful assembly."

The Boston gay pride group, formed in January, had petitioned last month for permission to march. After being turned down, they agreed last week to limit their numbers and abide by certain restrictions.

But the veteran's council, which has sponsored the parade for 46 years, reaffirmed their ban on Monday night. The vote was met by cheers from the "Southie" residents who claimed their children could not attend the parade if homosexuals marched.

BOSTON — Gov. William F. Weld, who signed a congressional redistricting bill into law Wednesday, acknowledged that his concerns in redrawing the map for U.S. House seats were largely political.

"It think it's a fair compromise," said Weld, a Republican, of the final map.

There are no Republicans in Massachusetts' current 11-member congressional delegation, and the plan strengthens GOP chances of winning a seat in Congress.

The state is in the midst of a court battle over Massachusetts' attempt to keep all its seats. Massachusetts has challenged 1990 U.S. Census figures that showed the state should lose a seat. The state of Washington was slated to gain one.

Before the ink was barely dry on the governor's signature, Secretary of State Michael J. Connolly made nomination papers available for congressional candidates.

"People were picking them up today by the hundreds," Connolly said.

State officials said that by moving the redistricting process on to the next step, the state strengthened its case to keep 11 seats. A federal court has ruled in Massachusetts' favor. But the U.S. Department of Justice, representing the Census, has warned the state it intends to fight for a reversal of the decision.

By moving nomination papers quickly, Massachusetts can make the argument that the loss of a seat would cause confusion in the state's 1992 congressional campaign.

"We feel very good about this," Connolly said. "We feel as though this is a major victory. The important thing is that we have got this process rolling and we are really establishing the hardship argument if the court were ever to reverse itself."

Nomination papers for congressional races must be returned to local election officials by May 5.

Weld gained several concessions from the Democratic controlled Legislature, improving the chances of GOP challengers in the state. He acknowledged that was his goal.

"I think it's legitimate on a redistricting discussion for politics to enter into it," Weld said.

One of the major changes was the removal of part of New Bedford from the 10th Congressional District, now represented by U.S. Rep. Gerry Studds (D-Mass.) New Bedford is heavily Democratic, and the shift was seen as a way to help the chances of GOP candidates, including former Weld administration undersecretary Dan Daly. Mike Crossen is another Republican candidate in the district, which includes Cape Cod.

Court: Heroic measures may be withheld

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state's highest court agreed Wednesday that no heroic measures must be taken to save the life of a child who is in a persistent coma.

The infant, referred to only as "Beth," was injured in an automobile accident that resulted in car seat straps wrapping around her neck and cutting off her oxygen supply.

As a result of the accident, the child, now 5, cannot see, hear or move. Her ability to breathe is limited, and a breathing tube has been inserted directly into her lungs. She is fed through a feeding tube permanently inserted in her stomach.

The child was born to minor parents. Less than a month after her birth, she was put in the custody of the Department of Social Services. Her mother was also found in need of protection and was placed under the care of DSS.

A guardian was appointed to represent the child. The guardian asked a single justice of the Supreme Judicial Court to block a Holyoke District Court judge's decision not to resuscitate the child if she suffered cardiac or respiratory arrest in the future.

The mother testified that she did not want to see her child suffer. "I know what she was like before this accident," she said. "She was a very healthy baby, always smiling . . . and she's just laying there doing nothing."

Justice Joseph Nolan dissented in the 4-1 decision. "The trial judge did not have a smidgen of evidence on which to conclude that if this child . . . were competent to decide, she would elect certain death to a life with no cognitive ability," Nolan said.

"He makes the analogies between what's going on at Harvard Law School and what's going on in the world at large," said Andy Levin, 31, a first-year law students from Ann Arbor, Mich.

In an open letter Wednesday, Dean Robert C. Clark said the record showed that the law school is committed to improving faculty diversity.

Since 1982, about a third of the tenured and tenure-track appointments have been of women and minorities, Clark said.

In an earlier address at the African Meeting House, Jackson urged the Democratic presidential candidates to broaden their appeal beyond the middle class.

Retired Gen. expounds lessons of Gulf War

By MADANMOHAN RAO
Collegian Staff

Retired Gen. Bernard Trainor, former military correspondent for the New York Times, spoke last night at Amherst College on the lessons of the Gulf War and its implications for U.S. military strategy in the post-Cold War era.

Trainor, who was a television analyst during the war, explained the events leading up to the war, saying Saddam Hussein had a vision of "a pan-Arab union," with Iraq as the leader.

"But we had dealt with bastards before, and we could do it again," Trainor said. Trainor added, Saddam Hussein "continues to be unchastened, despite our victory."

Trainor said the lessons of the war included the importance of intelligence and the superiority of high-technology.

"Technology will be the arbitrator in battlegrounds of the future," he said.

He said the war also proved the decisiveness of air power. "This is the first war in history where ground forces were only the supporting force," he said.

Trainor also had high praise for the quality of the U.S. forces. "The U.S. armed forces reconstituted itself after the doldrums following the Vietnam War," he said.

"Even if the Iraqis had fought well, we would still have cut through their forces like a hot knife through butter, and inflicted even greater casualties on them," Trainor said.

Other important lessons were the necessity of an airlift capability, and the value of "fighting as part of a coalition," Trainor said.

"It was very effective that we fought under the aegis of the United Nations, because of the important effect it had on the transgressor," he said.

"The Iraqis realized that they were facing not just the 'Great Satan,' as they made us out to be, but the entire civilized world, represented by the United Nations," Trainor said.

Some members of the audience questioned what they called "the lack of morality in the obscene mass murder of the Iraqis," but Trainor countered by saying that as long as "somebody is armed and wants to fight, they are legitimate targets.

"You feel sorry for the Iraqis? As a professional soldier, I must say that they would have done the same if they had the chance," said Trainor. "You should take a certain amount of pride in what the U.S. did."

As for future military strategies, Trainor said the threat posed by the Soviet Union has now been replaced by "the threat of uncertainty."

"Formerly, there was a fear that a military move might be provocative to the Soviet Union — but that impediment to rapid decision-making is now gone," Trainor said.

Addressing global security issues, Trainor said, "The Europeans are big boys now — with the collapse of the Soviet Union, we don't need to keep our forces there."

He said U.S. interests are now political, economic and moral. "For instance, in the Middle East, we have oil interests as well as moral obligations," he said.

Referring to recent Pentagon releases in the New York Times about likely scenarios of conflict, Trainor said that some scenarios were "ridiculous," while others were "realistic."

"It is likely that the Panama Canal might be taken over by right-wing forces connected to drug traffickers — we may have to go in there," Trainor said.

A major security concern, he said, is the "danger of nuclear proliferation among rogue nations." Trainor asked, "If Saddam had the Bomb, would the U.N. or Congress or the U.S. people come on board?"

Trainor advocated that the spread of nuclear weapons be checked by "stepped-up investigations, diplomatic and political measures, economic sanctions against pariah nations, and even pre-emptive military action if necessary.

A vote of confidence for the Minutemen

It's March and that can mean only one thing: it's time for March Madness folks. Conference tournaments are either beginning or ending, and on Sunday it will be time for the curtain to be raised and the Big Dance for 1992 will be unveiled.

The 22nd-ranked University of Massachusetts has already answered the question of whether or not they belong in the NCAAs, with a definitive yes. The question now is what number seed will the Minutemen be?

Entering the Atlantic 10 tournament final against West Virginia, the Minutemen look like a solid four or five seed.

Jeff Crofts

If the Minutemen walk off the Cage floor tonight as tourney champs, look for them to be a No. 4 seed, and possibly a No. 3.

If the Minutemen walk off the Cage floor tonight with their heads hung low, look for them to be seeded anywhere from fifth to seventh.

If UMass wins tonight, here are nine reasons for it to be seeded third:

1. The Atlantic 10 is now one of the six toughest conferences in the NCAA, and any team which wins both the regular season and tourney of a conference such as the A-10s deserves a great seed.
2. 28-4 will be the third best record in nation.
3. Never lost back to back games.
4. Will be on a 12-game winning streak.
5. Crushed two Big Eight teams (Oklahoma and Iowa State).
6. Alaskan Shootout Champs.
7. Abdow's Hall of Fame Champs.
8. 15-1 out of A-10.
9. Three of team's four losses were avenged (only Kentucky remains unscathed, but we might see them in the Dance).

I hope that get's rid of any doubts, now let's just hope the team plays a great game against West Virginia tonight.

Also, a No. 3 seed for the Minutemen would probably mean the team will be playing in Worcester come Dance time.

Am I the only one who thinks that a few of the Minutemen got screwed when it came to the All-Atlantic 10 team voting?

Anton Brown and Will Herndon didn't deserve places on any All-A-10 team? C'mon, yeah they did, who did the voting, our Editor in Chief Marc Elliot and the Democratic candidates for President?

How did Derrick Alston of Duquesne manage to make it to All-A-10 2nd team? My hamster Abercrombie has more skills in the low post than Alston, get him the hell out of there!

For that matter, Temple's Mark Strickland might be a defensive force, but he is an offensive neanderthal. Strickland, making the All-A-10 3rd team is equivalent to Ed Pinckney making the All-NBA 3rd team!

Brown is the rock of this UMass team and his leadership alone should've gotten him a spot on some team. As for Herndon, his awesome aerial acrobatics overshadow his overall skills, he should be on some team as well.

You could also argue that Tony Barbee deserves a spot somewhere on a team. But next year will be Barbee's year to shine.

Lou Roe didn't get freshman of the year, but once Roe get's the amount of playing time winner Jamal Phillips gets, we'll see who the better player really is!

first half and during crunch time in the second half.

The Minutewomen had a nine point lead in the first half, but they just let it slip away. Tied 5-5 with 11:48 left in the first half, the team went on a 14-3 run to pull away from the Lady Dukes.

Kim Kristofik scored 7 of her eight first half points during that six minute stretch, on three layups and a free throw. Kristofik was cold in the second half, and finished shooting 7-for-17. Her last layup gave UMass 14-7 lead, and after Carina Hoffman's two free throws cut the lead to seven, Jenny Moran countered with a jumper and Cass Anderson hit two free throws upped it to 19-8, the largest lead UMass would hold.

Women end the season with 44-35 loss in A-10s

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

All hopes for a miracle finish by the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team ended yesterday when the Minutewomen lost to Duquesne in Picataway, N.J. by a count of 44-35.

UMass (4-24, 0-16 in the Atlantic 10) came into the game with two key injuries that depleted the depth of their guard play. Senior Trish Riley had missed the last five games of the regular season with a chronic back injury, and Laurie Dondarski sprained her ankle at the tailend of the season.

Duquesne's guard, Darcie Vincent, carried the Dukes over UMass in two key stretches of the game: at the end of the

Minutemen-Mountaineers duel for title

Temple's Aaron McKie is mobbed by Will Herndon and Lou Roe in a game earlier this season. The Minutemen host West Virginia tonight in the Curry Hicks Cage in the Atlantic 10 finals.

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

This is it. One game to determine the Atlantic 10 champion. Forty minutes in one of the loudest and smallest arenas in America.

Tonight (9 p.m., ESPN) the University of Massachusetts (27-4) and West Virginia University (20-10) square off for all the marbles in the Curry Hicks Cage. The winner gets an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament and bragging rights in the A-10 for a year.

As it stands now, UMass is a lock for the NCAA tourney and West Virginia is most likely in, but stranger things have happened and the Mountaineers would rather not leave their fate in the hands of the Tournament Selection Committee.

"With an Atlantic 10 Conference Championship and an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament at stake, the least of my worries is motivating the players," said West Virginia coach Gale Catlett. "I think everyone understands the importance of this game."

"It's the seed we're worried about now," said UMass coach John Calipari. "We're in the [NCAA] tournament. A win might give us a little higher seed. If we win, we're hot going into the tourney. If we lose, we'll be ready to play in the NCAA's."

UMass beat Rutgers 106-94 in the A-10 quarterfinals Sunday and Rhode Island 77-66 Monday to get to tonight's contest. West Virginia held off Duquesne 76-69 and then, despite scoring only 8 points in the second half, were 3 points better than Temple in Monday's semifinal game in Philadelphia.

"If you had stopped the game halfway through the second half and said, 'you can bet a million dollars your team is going to score more than 10 points,' I'd have bet everything I had," Catlett said.

"We have led the league more years in scoring than anyone else," Catlett said. "It's kind of hard to run the ball up and down the court against Temple when they're holding it for thirty-five seconds. We would have liked to have an up-tempo game against Temple, but not many folks get up-tempo games against them."

The Minutemen and Mountaineers have already met twice this season, with each team winning on the other team's home court, making this the rubber-game.

Back in January, the Mountaineers came to the Curry Hicks Cage and won a 76-75 thriller which had all the emotion of a tournament game.

"[UMass] had broken into the Top 25," Catlett said. "They had just beaten Iowa State and Oklahoma. I'm not sure they were focused for that game."

Two weeks ago in Morgantown, W.Va., the Minutemen returned the favor, with a 74-69 overtime win which catapulted them into first place in the A-10, where they eventually finished.

West Virginia point guard Marsalis Basey, who has scored 18 points and dished out 13 assists in two games against UMass this season is listed as doubtful for tonight's game. Basey injured his neck in a game against George Washington earlier this season and it has been bothering him enough to keep him out of this weekend's first two games.

With Basey out, Mike Boyd, who played well this past weekend (15 points against Duquesne) will start. It also means Tracy Shelton should see more time.

UMass, which is ranked 22nd in the latest Associated Press poll, has won 11-straight games since losing Jan. 28 at Temple. It's 27 wins is the most in the nation.

"It's going to be one of those down-to-the-wire battles," Calipari said. "I think both teams are going to be ready to play."

Game Notes: The game can be seen on ESPN with Sean McDonough and Terry Holland. It can also be heard on WMUA (91.1 FM) with Joe Donovan and Jeff Crofts or on WHMP (99.3 FM) with George Miller and Kevin Kennedy.

It's a grand finale in the Cage

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Last night, a capacity crowd at the Curry Hicks Cage witnessed 20 minutes of the best basketball this campus has ever seen.

The University of Massachusetts basketball team (28-4), finished what it started back in December winning its first-ever Atlantic 10 Championship with a 97-91 victory over West Virginia in the A-10 tournament finals.

With 9:45 remaining in the first half, the Minutemen held a 31-7 lead. With 4:51 left, they led 41-16. Do you get the idea what kind of night it was?

West Virginia's leading scorer Chris Leonard (12 points) put it best when he said, "UMass was jumping at every ball and it all compounded upon itself the entire first half. It was one long twenty minute run."

Harper Williams, the Tournament MVP, was a torrid 4-for-5 in the first half. He finished with a team-high 18 points in only 26 minutes, but his contribution can not fairly be measured by statistics alone.

Williams scored seven of UMass' first nine points, as the Minutemen built a 9-2 lead just 1:40 into the game. Not only was he scoring, but he was rebounding and stopping Ricky Robinson, who outplayed him badly when the team's met in West Virginia, two weeks ago.

Robinson finished with 17 points, but eight came in the second half, and he had only two in the first 10:40 of the first half. When he scored his fourth point of the night, UMass had already built an overwhelming 31-9 lead.

"In the first five minutes, we acted like we were a half a step behind," said West Virginia coach Gale Catlett. "Then in the second five minutes, we were a step behind.

"It's very difficult to get behind a team like UMass," he said. "They've been a great team all year long and I think they'll do very well in the NCAA tournament."

The win ensures the Minutemen of a bid to the NCAA's Big Bash, which begins on Thursday. It is the first time since 1962, that UMass will be in the tourney.

Leading 11-5, the Minutemen went on a 20-2 run which for all intents and purposes put the game away.

It was the kind of blitz that coaches

Newnan, Wood win elections by 3-1 margin

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Both the reelected Student Trustee, Kevin Newnan, and the newly elected Student Government President, Jen Wood, won their respective elections yesterday by 3 to 1 margins over their opponents.

"I feel good about winning the election and about serving another year to fight for the students' rights," Newnan said.

Wood, who defeated Jeff Markuns, said she was glad all the time and energy she and other supporters put into her campaign was worth the effort. "I'm glad that hard work can pay off," she said.

Wood said her campaign consisted of letting the students know that both her and Newnan understood the students' need to have access to the University of Massachusetts administration considering the pending tuition fee increase and financial aid cuts.

"[Newnan] and I really want to bring student activism back to the Student Government Asso-

Despite recession, vacations to span all over globe

By DAVID RIVERA
Collegian Staff

Large numbers of Spring-Breakers lined up yesterday at local travel agencies in preparation of Spring Break 1992.

Resembling a New York delicatessen at lunch time, US Travel, the concourse travel agency, saw one of its most active business days yet.

UMass students were eagerly waiting for tickets and reservations for trips which span the globe.

Suzanne Couture, a travel consultant for US Travel, was still working without a lunch break at three p.m. when she expressed her view of Break 92.

"Things have been crazy," she said. "You would never know that we were in a recession."

Couture said she had logged some overtime do to the influx of student travelers but that she didn't mind the extra work due to the students and their travel requests.

"We've got people going all over the world from China to Africa," Couture said. "One guy wanted to go to Cuba, which is of limits to Americans."

Couture also added that some students have taken advantage of special students' travel coupons offered by credit card companies which allow some to travel cross country for under 200 dollars.

Some students have even planned road trips with rented cars which Couture said was a very inexpensive alternative to air travel.

Problems have arisen when students, expecting inexpensive last minute travel, find nothing but overpriced fares.

"The only problems we've had is when people expect deals at the last minute," Courture said, adding "a last minute trip to Florida can cost up to 700 dollars."

Though most local agencies have had good business as of late, many UMass students are finding it hard to afford such trips.

"I'm going home," said Tracy Lessor, UMass freshman and exercise science major. "I don't have the money to travel."

Some students showed no guilt in admitting their plans for a frivolous week.

"I'm going to Colorado to ski," said Hub Chittick, a senior mechanical engineering major. "It beats ice-fishing on Puffers pond."

Gary Deane, a junior communication major, is just one of many students who has taken advantage of the coupons offered by American Express and is traveling to Chicago to experience the blues scene. "I've got family there," Deane said. "So I can afford this break."

Business has also been busy at the University Health Services where students have been purchasing condoms and other protective aids for safe sex.

Dr. James Abel, of the University Health Services, said students are becoming more aware of the dangers of unsafe sex, but he also added that one in four who don't use protection will return from their trip with an STD.

Dr. Abel recommends students use both condoms and spermicides if they plan to have sex.

Council meets to vote on tuition

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

The status of the proposed 4 percent tuition hike is now down to the wire as the Higher Education Coordinating Council meets in Boston today.

A bus carrying members of the Graduate Employee Organization, the Graduate Student Senate, and undergraduates departed from campus this morning to transport them to the 1 p.m. meeting.

"We have to stand up for the right to affordable higher education," said GEO speaker Mary Jo Connelly.

"Today is just part of a larger campaign to bring state appropriations to an acceptable level and fight against tuition retention," she said.

"Enough is enough," said student trustee Kevin Newnan, who will be speaking at the meeting. "A line must be drawn. It's time to start a new system of higher education."

Jeff Markuns, a junior zoology major, has been a student representative on the HECC council since Sept. 1991. He said he spent his winter break researching the tuition problem.

"Students should no longer bear the brunt of the state's lack of commitment," he said.

Marjorie Decker, a STPEC and women's studies major, said, "UMass is becoming a school for only the middle class."

Decker, who has been campaigning this past week to mobilize University undergraduates to attend today's meeting, will be speaking on behalf of the undergraduates.

"Students just don't realize that if fifty or more of them show up to the meeting, it will make the difference," she said. "No one can do it for them, but they can do something about it.

"I was told by a senator recently, 'aren't there community colleges those students can go to?' But community colleges don't have a fraction of the opportunities a public university is supposed to have," she said.

Mark Kenen, president of the Graduate Student Senate, said, "We've heard there's some disagreement between HECC council members about the vote. It should be interesting."

David Lenson, president of the Massachusetts Society of Professors, will be speaking at the meeting on behalf of the union for the University's Amherst, Boston and Dartmouth campuses. He will be addressing tuition retention and announcing MSP's "vote of no confidence" in state Secretary of Education Dr. Piedad Robertson.

"[The MSP] is annoyed that there has been no attempt for a realistic budget for the whole system," he said. "We need something better than anything put forward so far.

"We're very disappointed with the Secretary of Education because she hasn't done a thing to help us. It's maddening," he added, "the way her office deals with the press, saying everything's fine. The only way to solve a problem is to acknowledge its existence."

Project destroys Cree culture

By LEIGH ANN KNOPE
Collegian Corrsepondent

The largest hydroelecricity project in the world, James Bay 1, located in North Quebec, has devastated the cultures of indigenous peoples there and the environment, said a member of one community.

Will Nichols, of the Grand Council of the Crees, and Ann Stewart, co-founder of the Massachsuetts Save James Bay, said Monday that people should think about their responsibility as consumers of the electricity.

Hydro-Quebec, the company who constructed the project, currently sells its electricity to New England and New York, as well as to South Quebec. Massachusetts buys 6 percent of the total energy produced, he said.

In order to create this electricity, land the size of Connecticuit has been flooded, Nichols said. This has serious effects on 6,000 Crees and 4,000 Inuits who have lived in the area for over 5,000 years as well as the wildlife.

"We call this the 'dead zone,' also 'the sacrifice to the south,'" Nichols said. "We have had one-third of our lives destroyed for something that we don't need."

Nichols told of the mercury level in the waters which is now high above government standards. When the land was flooded, Nichols explained, the vegitation rotted and caused methyl mercury to leech into the fish, a large part of the Cree diet. Two-thirds of their community is poisoned with mercury, he said. Hydro-Quebec estimates this will last for 20-30 years and independent researchers have estimated at least 100 years, Nichols said.

Nichols talked about the effects on the wildlife, which in Cree culture, are equals of humans. He said the migratory birds, seals, otters, eagles, osprays and beavers have lost their way of life. In one damming incident alone, Nichols said, 10,000 caribou drowned when attempting to carry out their normal migration.

Nichols said Crees are a hunter-gatherer society, depending on the land and rivers for survival.

Preserving their culture, they resisted this project since 1970, when construction began without the Cree's consent, he said. They have been in court for the last 20 years. Since James Bay 1 was completed, Hydro-Quebec plans to expand: James Bay II.

"After these people have poisoned one-third of my land, they are back. Everything within Cree territory, all river systems, eventually will be dammed and everything will be poisoned.

"These people are greedy. They believe that the price of electricity is the Cree. But I have to say no. No with my emotions. This is racism, but it's more than simple racism. It's enviornmental racism."

Nichols said the Crees have brought their battle to the consumers of electricity because the Quebec government has violated their basic rights and people here have a responsibility.

"Every time you turn on your lights and computers, think a little about where the energy is coming from," Stewart said.

Stewart urged individuals to call and write to their utillity to voice opposition. She also encouraged people to write to legislators and the Quebec government as well. She said four bills will soon be voted on which may aid the Cree in their struggle.

ciation and focus on putting together a campaign against tuition increases," said Wood.

Newnan, who outpolled Chris Moran, said he wants to mobilize the student body and make the student voice louder. "I want to get the message out that SGA is the way for students to have their voice heard and for students to get involved," Newnan said.

To strengthen the student voice, Wood said, the SGA and residential area governments must meet with students and discuss what needs to be done on campus.

"The more the student body knows about what the administration and the SGA are doing the more attached they will be to the SGA," said Wood.

Newnan and Wood said they are very pleased to be working with each other. "Wood is a great organizer due to her involvement with the "Vote No on 3" campaign and because she was chapter chairperson at MassPIRG," said Newnan.

"Newnan did a knock-out job last year as Student Trustee. We will make a terrific team together," said Wood.

Jon Aronson, election coordinator, said the MassPIRG waivable fee will be on the tuition bill next semester. He also said because the Campus Ministries question did not reach the required 15 percent quota of voters, the decision as to whether it will appear on next semester's tuition bill is pending.

Jewish celebration of Purim to begin

BY DAVID MOHEBAN
Collegian Correspondent

Every year, on the eve of the 14th of the Jewish month of Adar, the festival of Purim begins. It is a holiday of eating, drinking, giving gifts to friends and dressing up. It is also a holiday rich in tradition and history.

On Purim, Jews gather at synagogue to hear the reading of the Megillah, also called "The Story of Esther." The Megillah is one of the five scrolls included in the Bible.

The story of Purim is ancient, dating back to the time of the Persian Empire when King Achasuerus held dominion. According to the story, the king was looking for a queen, when his gaze fell upon the beautiful maiden Esther. He immediately fell in love and made her his queen.

During the rule of King Achasuerus, Haman, the king's most powerful minister, ordered everyone to bow down before him. There was, however, a certain Jew by the name of Mordecai who refused to bow before him. In Haman's fury, he plotted to kill all the Jewish people.

Mordecai was the cousin of Queen Esther, who until then had kept her Jewish identity a secret. When she learned of Haman's evil plan, she confessed to the king her identity and said that if the decree were carried out then she too would perish with her people.

King Achasuerus, to show his love for his Queen, plotted to kill Haman. Haman was invited to be the guest of honor at a great party. He came to the party suspecting nothing, when Queen Esther told the King at their feast, sitting right next to Haman, that the adversary and enemy of the empire was Haman. Haman's evil plan was foiled, and the Jewish people were saved from a terrible fate.

So every year on the 14th of the Jewish month of Adar, Purim comes around with its feasting, merriment, and Hamentashens. The Hamentashen is a triangle shaped pastry that is based on the triangle shaped hat Haman wore, and is usually filled with poppy seeds or jam. On the reading of the Megillah, when Haman's name is read aloud, Jews are instructed to stamp out and drown out his name with the loud noise of a "grogger" or noisemaker. It is also a custom to become drunk enough to be unable to distinguish between "blessed be Mordecai" and "cursed be Haman." Purim is also a time of masquerades and costume parties, in which people dress up like the characters in the story of Purim.

The meaning of Purim also includes the fight against anti-Semitism. "Haman had clearly stereotyped the Jewish people because they were different," said Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, Director of Hillel. "We can also see the potential dangers that can result from this kind of stereotyping."

Rabbi Perlmutter said it is interesting to note that Purim comes about one month before Passover, adding that Purim "paves the way for Passover." King Achasuerus is seen as a buffoon, even though he ruled over many provinces, Perlmutter said. "By being able to poke fun at one somewhat harmless tyrant, we prepare ourselves to shake free from another ruler, the Pharaoh of Egypt ian Passover.

"A people who maintain their sense of humor and a skepticism about earthly power is well prepared to fight for their freedom. If you laugh at one king, you can

Film depicts women's resistance to invasion

By SARAH LEVESQUE
Collegian Staff

The opening shots of "Women from Lebanon" are filled with colors, and so lush: the branches of trees, the flowers, the scarves wrapped around the women's heads. One wonders if colors such as these even exist in the United States

The only sounds the viewer hears are the chirping of birds and whispers of nature — cut to a shot of a southern Lebanese woman feeding a baby bird with a dropper. These women are baking bread, telling their children stories. Mothers, daughters, sisters.

This opening sequence introduces the audience to the protagonists of this film, the women and girls of the resistance to the Israeli invasion and occupation of southern Lebanon.

Directors Mai Masri and Jean Chamoun reveal to their viewers, a world that is not always acknowledged by the western media. This film documents the oppression and resistance of these nameless women and girls.

"They break into our houses after midnight, scare our children and then call us terrorists," one angry mother said. She is speaking to us, not the camera. In this shot of women and young girls, they speak of how they fought the Israeli soldiers who threatened them and imprisoned or killed their husbands and sons.

A young woman tells of 25 soilders being ordered to walk on her back. An older woman points to the hill where a woman stood hurling stones. "The bullet went right through her," and the woman points to the side of her head.

These women and girls were not intimidated. A 70-year-old woman was shot, a bullet ripped through her, as she stood up to the tanks that plowed her village. This she tells us as she makes these huge, puffy, golden circles of bread

The main focus of this film is the Shi'ite women of southern Lebanon, but the reason why they are driven to such a passionate response to the soldiers and their guns, even the tanks, is the imprisonment and killing of their fathers, husbands and brothers.

An extremely poetic and emotional scene in the film is the mourning of two male martrys. The women sing and sob, vocalizing their agony and emotional torture. The two framed pictures, crowned with flowers, are placed upright on chairs.

The viewer meets the woman who stood on a tall mound of sand near the prison camp where her husband was locked away, not allowed to leave his tent. She stood there, waving her arms and began to cry out "Allah is great! Allah is great!"

The prisoners, hearing her voice, came out of their tents. The women and girls that were also there, began to join in her cry. They yelled out the names of their loved ones who answered them back. And then "naturally, the tanks came and we had to leave," the woman tells us. "This was my last demonstration."

The woman on the hill was taken from her home, tortured and put in a camp. Much of this is visually re-enacted for the viewer.

A piecing together of history is taking place. To the sountrack of Sana speaking of her decision to do a suicide bombing, the audience watches the footage of the white car turning jaggedly around the corner and heading straight into an Israeli tank.

The two explode, entangled. Sana is an important martyr in Lebanon and the self-sacrifice she made to the resistance movement has made her a kind of heroine.

The question lingers if precarious white car will become an important metaphor, the ultimate sacrifice for freedom, for modernist Middle Eastern film directors, some what like the importance of the white phone, associated with fascism in Italian film.

The style of "Women from Southern Lebanon" is a powerful combination of actual footage of violent confrontation and re-enactment of the battles these women waged.

It has been said that tracking shots are connected to morality, that being the case, this film is extremely moral. There are many tracking shots of southern Lebanon countryside, as the women speak of their protests.

The tellers of their stories always take us to the setting, the actual place where it happened. We see the person and place, and through those two mediums, along with excellent direction from Masri and Chamoun (and the art of film), the women and girls of Southern Lebanon tell their stories. Their history is recorded.

"Women from Southern Lebanon" was part three of "The Arab World: Women and Cinema", a four-part series of screenings presented by Five College Near Eastern Studies.

In part four, "A Measure of Distance" (Palestine/Lebanon/England, 1988) Mona Hatoum and "The Fertile Memory" (Palestine/Belgium, 1980) Michel Khlefi will be screened Wednesday, March 25 at Amherst College at Stirn Auditorium and Thursday, March 26 at Smith College at Wright Hall Auditorium.

Video portrays internal issues of homophobia

By WENDY JOHNSON
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts students were given the chance to view and shape Beyond Coming Out, a half-hour long video which confronts the issue of internalized homophobia and its expression within the gay and lesbian community, Tuesday, in the Campus Center.

Beyond Coming Out is the latest self-produced, work-in-progress by noted lesbian photographer, videographer, and author Joan E. Biren, a.k.a. JEB, who for the past 20 years, has been documenting the lesbian and gay movement, using photography and videotaping to capture images.

Felice Yeskel, director of the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns, introduced JEB by noting that "she's always been right there at the edge of whatever's happening in the gay and lesbian movement."

Biren's credentials include two books of photography, Eye to Eye: Portraits of Lesbians (1979), and Making a Way: Lesbians Out Front (1987), each a journalistic essay of lesbians proudly being themselves.

Biren has also put together several videos, which, along with visual images, incorporate music, poetry, and the spoken word. One video is For Love and For Life: The 1987 March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights, which aired on PBS.

"Internalized homophobia should be more rightly labled 'shame due to heterosexism,'" Biren said, "because the shame most gays and lesbians feel doesn't come from within.

"After 20 years of activism, I still found I was in my own stage of denial. My behavior was affected by how society hated me as a lesbian. This is why I wanted to do this project," Biren said.

For one part of the video, Biren asked lesbians and gays how they expressed their own shame. Some answers included:

"I don't tell people at work about my life, even though they talk about theirs."

"I have two sets of clothes; 'gay and straight.'"

"I don't hug, kiss, or even hold hands with my [partner] in front of parents or friends."

Biren then asked those same people what they wish their parents and friends would say to them:

"As long as you're happy, love whoever you want."

"I can't wait to tell all of my friends that you're gay!"

"When's the wedding?"

"These are 'normal things' which might be said to heterosexuals," Biren said, "but taken [in the context of homosexuality] they are both funny and sad."

Feeling ashamed because one is gay or lesbian was a recurring theme, as articulated by a person in the film who said "We grew up believing that we were wrong. Living a secret life led to shame and guilt. . . A split-personality develops; one is public, one is real. . . and your real self [seems] unacceptable, unspeakable, and wrong."

Ms. Innocent, are you for real?

I always enjoy reading the Multicultural Affairs section of the Collegian because it gives me an opportunity to be exposed to ideas and experiences from many different backgrounds and cultures. I do not strictly mean to impose my Western values onto anybody, but the article that appeared on the March 7, 1992 issue of the Collegian under the headline, "The broken stereotype who broke my heart" was so ridiculous and pointless that it merits a rebuttal.

In abstract, the article was apparently written by a supposedly Chinese young woman who chose to remain anonymous and attempted to convey to the readers that she let one of her American male friends fulfill his Madam Butterfly sexual fantasy, and she went on a guilt trip about his indebtedness and obligation to one billion people and so on and so forth. (Incidentally, by "an American guy," did she mean a European-, not African-, Asian-, Hispanic- or Native-American guy; and "Three months passed and I realized I was in love!"; she had sex with this man?)

I am also from a very far away place and find the norms and the values of this community amusing and intriguing. It was amazing, however, to note that her values and beliefs were light years apart from mine. She described it as if a pure, virginal, pristine, innocent, chastised young woman from the People's Republic of China was violently deflowered by a typical, young American male according to her stereotypical perceptions. She "never thought that someday she may fall in love (have sex with) with an American guy." Ms. Pure and Innocent, are you for real?

If you had been so afraid of being deflowered by a stereotypical young American male, then why did you bother to acquaint yourself with this woman in the first place? Besides, did you truly not have any ample opportunity to shoot down his sexual advances? Now that you have had a sexual encounter with this man, what exactly are you afraid of? We Californians believe that we are here to enjoy life, not to suffer by engaging ourselves in a guilt trip about sex. Now that you had a chance to lose your virginity, why not let more of your stereotypical American young male friends to satisfy their Ms. Saigon fantasies? If you have enjoyed your sexual experience with this man, well then, more power to you. If you have not, you needed not to go on a guilt trip about it—just don't tell your grandmother in your village.

Thank you, Ms. Pure and Innocent. Because of you, I had an opportunity to realize what a perverted and degenerate stereotypical young American male I was. (Talking about being falsely modest and pretense!) Let me throw you a curveball, in closing, though. Can you imagine a racially-opposite relationship with your scenario; that is, a Chinese man having a sexual relationship with a (European-) American woman? Would you please tell me which one is supposed to go on a guilt trip, according to your culture?

Off-the-wall writer is back

Due to a lack of huge events that would normally warrant a single topic column, I present in it's place an amusing collection of clever vignettes that are infinitely more fun. Yes, the wacky, crazy, off the wall writer is back from the dregs of serious society and unquietly slipping back into the world of the odd and unexplainable.

Lorrie Cozzens

Let's start with this mystery Valentine "secret admirer" story. A few columns ago, I suggested single persons send secret Valentines to those they wanted to get to know. Needless to say, someone dropped one under my door way back then, and I've yet to discover the identity of this individual. It was amusing, but now it's over. I want to know who sent it!!! I doubt the person will surface anyway, but I had to give it one last encouraging shove. Now is the time!

I have just realized my latest short term goal. I want to be the host of the next "Notes From The Campus Center Basement". Maybe I can bribe Marc Elliot with one of those peanut butter bars from the Bluewall. How about it, Marc?

I give a lot of credit to those people who have the ability to fall asleep anywhere. I would be frightened to death to sleep on one of the couches in the Cape Cod lounge. I would probably be caught drooling and talking in my sleep just as the man of my dreams (Mickey Rourke at UMass?) walks by and cringes in disgust. Even better, it could possibly end up as a cover photo for this paper. What better way to escalate or diminish the career of a promising young writer?

I have heard the mildly disgruntled complain about the current status of their love lives recently. Bluntly, there isn't any existence. It is difficult to understand this when there are so many people. The greatest conversation opener (without inflicting too much obviousness) is "Were you here to get the notes last week? I missed it, could I borrow yours?" You know what I mean.

There are few challenges I can resist. Ron, you're in the column. You can kill me if you think you can, but I really don't want my roommate getting a 4.0 at my expense.

Jim's Journal is really swell. My favorite character is Mr. Peterson, the cat.

A word to the wise: Please do not harass the mailperson while he/she is distributing the mail into individual boxes. Hovering over them like a ghost will not get your mail to you any faster. Also, tens of hands reaching and grabbing over their shoulders is not only rude, but confusing as well. This only slows down the process of getting the mail out, annoys the mailperson, and sometimes results in mixing up who gets what. So please be patient! If you received mail, you'll get it soon enough.

Spring break is just a blink away. Granted, I won't be doing much. Unfortunately, there is an unwritten rule of life that your friends vacations never coincide with your own. The best thing to do is rent all the videos you've been meaning to see and make some popcorn. If you are lucky enough to be heading off to someplace warm, do me a favor and don't tell me about it. I'm jealous as is.

Well, I'll be meandering off now. One last thing to my loyal readers in Baker: Thanks for the laugh, at least you were paying attention. (The family always said I had to have the last word. I can think of worse qualities.)

Signing off..

Lorrie Cozzens is a Collegian columnist.

The Phone Aliens have landed!

Fellow students! There is something of grave importance that I must share with you! Indeed, it may be a matter of life or death! There are aliens among us. . .

Let me tell you how I came to this startling revelation.

EVIDENCE #1 : Go back to your dorm room and look at your phone. It doesn't look like a normal phone, does it? We are told that it is the "cutting edge" of phone technology. . .if it is, then what the @%$*# are we doing with it?

EVIDENCE #2 : Have you ever noticed, while talking on said phones, that you can sometimes hear very faint bleepings and voices which are just indistinguishable? Subliminal brainwashing, I tell you!

EVIDENCE #3 : Have you ever noticed that bizarre little brick building between Northeast and Sylvan? It has no windows. We are told it is "for the phones. . ." Uh-huh. I think it's the aliens transporter station.

EVIDENCE #4 : Have you ever noticed those sleek little Ericsson vans driving around campus? There are always two suspiciously average and non-descript "men" in them, wearing dark sunglasses. There are no windows in the vans. All they do is drive around, following students and watching. They never stop anywhere.

So here's my theory: Aliens from the planet Ericsson have come to UMass in order to brainwash and kidnap students and take them to their home planet to use them for alien phone sex. Think about it: bizarre phones, unexplained little buildings, faint murmurings, strange men in vans watching us. You decide, but remember...The Phone Aliens are out to get us!

And now on a lighter note: a fluff sandwich for Spring Break

Yes, like Mark Twain once said, "The rumors of my death have been greatly exaggerated." It is true that there was call for my dismissal, but thanks to the faithful, I'm still around writing about things I know nothing about. And you, the reader, benefits!

Warning: the following column is serious fluff. Unless you're a diehard fan (read: Mom), serious caution is advised in reading this. Well, I can't say I didn't warn you.

For a change, instead of focusing on something negative about the University, I'll try to think of everything positive about UMass to send you all home happy.

First and foremost, we have what will be the Nation's top collegiate basketball team by April 5th. My friends are probably cringing at seeing this, but I have to make public my prediction that UMass will win the National Championship over Kentucky.

Yes, not only will our school be the next N.C. State or Villanova, an underdog who takes it all the way, but the school will make millions (timely, isn't it?) off licensing clothes, hats, and the like. Just think, by the time we go back to school in September, we'll be rolling in the dough.

A correlation to our outstanding basketball team is the near completion of the Mullins Center. The Mullins arena will be a source of pride not only for the school, but for Western Mass also. The all-purpose Center will be able to attract bigger entertainers, sports teams, and the like, and it will also hopefully be a source of revenue down the road.

Michael Morrissey

Okay, okay, besides sports, there are many bright spots here at UMass. The education is the best in the state when you consider experience in and out of the classroom. Sure, Harvard has some of the best professors in the world, but you have to walk ten blocks through a city filled with trash and bums. Here, it's only a ten-minute walk through trash and bums!

Seriously, when you think about the tolerance for a wide range of opinions, UMass is the best. I've learned a lot in my short time here (No, I don't think I know everything!) in terms of gulp, . . . diversity. While I don't ever agree with the majority on this campus, it's cool to know there's a place for everyone.

The obvious bright spot of UMass is that we party harder on anyone else. The $9,000 tuition leaves money for kegs and party balls that just ain't happening at Coppin State. I would like to salute all of the students who have worked hard to make UMass the swill capital of the country. We're number 1!

(Let's see, how many lines left?) The residence halls on campus have a lot, I mean a little, going for them. First of all, they are all equally close to classes. Secondly, you meet a lot of cool people in the dorms that turn into lifetime friends. And, the dorms have heat too!

Yup, they usually turn it on by the middle of November! And by the first sign of Spring, the room is nice and cool to combat the heat waves Amherst has during March.

The Microfridges are the coolest things that I have ever seen. Unfortunately, I haven't been able to rent one for the last year. The best part about the Microfridge is the huge freezer they have. You can hold a half gallon of ice cream in it!

I've saved the best for last: the Dining Commons. You know that although you always complain, you really love the brown ground up lettuce in the salad bar. And the Saskatchewan Beef is a true delicacy. Have a good Break, I'm glad I cheered you all up!

Confidential to "aggravated and pissed off:" Maybe you should see what my friends are like before you comment on them.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Go ahead and be a little unconventional if you want. A new hairstyle or daring outfit certainly will attract attention. Sign a contract only after reading the fine print. Protect your resources.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Be firm if someone tries to distract you from your work. Close attention to details is essential if you want to impress higher-ups. Be aware of your co-workers' feelings and actions.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A recent investment pays off in big bucks and wider prestige. You are in the driver's seat, elated that all your hard work has finally paid off! Romance begins to heat up. Go slow.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Those of you who have been overly dependent on another person's advice may decide to strike out on your own. Tap into your considerable psychic powers.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Someone sends you a message that arouses your curiosity. Do not believe everything you hear. Stick to the logical and practical. Enjoy a platonic relationship.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Although you treasure your independence, group activities might hold a certain fascination this weekend. Your versatility and charm make you quite a dynamic speaker.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): If you put your mind to work, you will find a way to increase your income. A partner makes a helpful suggestion. Act on it immediately! Others have the same idea.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Uniting with like-minded people will put you on the path to financial success. Move around, speak freely and dig for data. The facts and figures add up. Rent a good movie tonight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Tooting your own horn could hinder career growth now. Sing the praise of other people instead. Seek your place in the sun without a lot of fanfare. Your talent speaks for itself.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You really do have the power to transform negatives into positives today. Tackle a recurring problem from a different angle. Newcomers will be impressed by your get-up-and-go.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A business plan could short-circuit. Go slow. Influential people at a distance provide advice. Take a leaf from an older person's book and prepare for future.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): The tides of change benefit you both financially and emotionally. Focus on pleasing people who have power and wealth today. Their financial backing could bring you sudden prosperity.

For example, one clip showed a lesbian comedian poking fun at the names of lesbian clubs, mentioning that such clubs usually have names like "Secrets," or "Fantasies," rather than blatantly labeling themselves as lesbian bars. "I'd like to see," said the comedian, "a dyke bar called 'Girls Lick Girls.' I dare 'em!"

Other comments in the film explain why many gay clubs have discreet names and locations. "We are supposed to hide out, shut up, and disappear."

dismiss another," he said.

Other customs of Purim include the sending of gifts, (Mishloach Manot), and giving gifts to the poor, (Matanot L'Evyonim). Every Jew is required to send gifts of food to at least two other persons. A festival meal (Seudat Purim) is held during Purim Day itself to recall the feasting of the Jews in Persia. It is also customary to collect tzedakah, or charity money in the synagogue just prior to the reading of the Megillah. The day before Purim is known as the "Fast of Esther" (Ta'anit Esther) which is a day of fasting that serves as a reminder of Esther's fast before she went to the king to plead on behalf of her people.

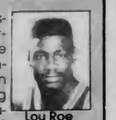
Player of the game



Lou Roe
6'7 Fr. F

University of Massachusetts forward Lou Roe scored a season-high 17 points on 6-for-10 shooting and tied his season best with 10 rebounds. Roe saved his best game of the year for last night's finale at the Cage looking more like a senior then the freshman he is. Roe was also 5-for-6 from the charity stripe.

Why UMass Won

The Minutemen didn't allow the Mountaineers into double figures until 8:31 of the first half. In that time, UMass built a 34-11 lead (including a 23-2 run) sparked by two three-pointers (Brown and Malloy) as well as the all-out hustle of Herndon and H. Williams. The UMass lead ballooned to as much as 26, before the half. The Mountaineers launched a semi-comeback in the second half trimming the lead to 9 with 1:14 left, but free throws by both McCoy and H. Williams ultimately led to UMass' cutting down of the nets.

UMass' next opponent

With the victory, UMass gains an automatic bid in the field of 64 NCAA tournament, which begins next week. UMass' seed and opponent in the Tournament will be announced live on CBS. UMass closes out the season at 28-4, its best season since Julius Erving's 1970-71 team went 23-4.

dream of.

"There are a lot of coaches who looked at that first half and said, 'Oh, my goodness let's hope we don't draw them (in the tournament),'" said UMass coach John Calipari.

Tony Barbee hit a short jumper from the baseline, Anton Brown buried a long jumper, Lou Roe jammed home a feed from Williams, Brown hit a trey, Malloy hit from International Waters and West Virginia could not buy a basket.

Pervires Greene (21 points) silenced the crowd for a brief moment, scoring the Mountaineers only basket in the 6:19 stretch. But on UMass' next possession, Williams hit a tell-tale foul line jumper with Leonard all-over his shooting elbow.

Roe, who finished with a season-high 17 points and grabbed 10 rebounds, scored UMass' next five points to complete the 20-2 spurt.

The Minutemen led by as many as 26 points in the first half, after Brown (10 points) nailed a trifecta with 1:24 remaining before the break.

"Our offense wasn't flowing the way we had wanted it to," Greene said. "They got all the loose balls and all the loose rebounds."

At halftime, the Minutemen held a 52-28 advantage. They shot 60 percent for the half, while the Mountaineers (20-11) were an abysmal 38 percent from the floor.

UMass was unable to play at that same level for the next 20 minutes and West Virginia shot a lot better. The Mountaineers hit 61 percent from the floor in the second half (52 percent for the game).

They got to within 19 with 12:46 remaining in the game and it appeared as though UMass lost some intensity.

"You've got to understand that it's hard when you're up by 26 [points] to keep playing the way you're playing," Calipari said. "You let up a little bit and you give up a few easy layups. And that's what we did.

"But I'm proud of these guys and I'm proud of the game," he said.

UMass scored its last field goal of the game with 5:11 to play, when Will Herndon (9 points, 3 steals) drove the baseline and dunked.

From there, Tracy Shelton nailed a three-pointer to pull the Mountaineers within 16. Greene burried a jumper in the lane with 3:04 left to make it 85-71.

Down the stretch, the Minutemen hit 12 of 15 free throws but the Mountaineers were throwing in some improbable shots which were reminiscent of the game against Boston University earlier this season, a game the Minutemen won by only two points after building a large lead.

Mike Boyd's layup with 1:14 to play brought the Mountaineers to within nine, 90-81, as close as they had been since the score was 13-5.

Boyd's two layups in the final seconds made the final tally 97-91.

Collegian phot by Josh Reynolds

University of Massachusetts freshman forward Lou Roe lays in two of his 17 points in last night's A-10 tournament final at the Curry Hicks Cage.

Roe putting on post-season show

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

Lou Roe ended his first season in a University of Massachusetts uniform last week — the regular season. Because once the post-season began, he has been playing like a three-year veteran.

Roe, who was named to the Atlantic 10 tournament team, poured in a career-high 17 points (12 in the first half), grabbed 10 rebounds (six offensive) and blocked two shots in the Minutemen's A-10 Championship final win over West Virginia last night at the Curry Hicks Cage.

In UMass' three tournament wins, Roe averaged 12 points and 9.6 rebounds per game.

"He was unbelievable," UMass coach John Calipari said of Roe, who averaged 6.9 points and 6.0 rebounds during the regular season. "To be a freshman and do the things he did — going through people, rebounding above the rim, defending, blocking shots — I was happy for him."

Roe, who has seen limited action all season as a result of UMass returning five starters, averaged 23.7 minutes per game in the tournament, 29 in last night's 97-91 win.

"He's accepted his role coming off the bench," Calipari said. "And he's performed when we need him to."

Harper Williams, who saw less time than his average last night due to foul trouble, said, "This is the time of year you show you can play and [Lou Roe] played tremendous."

"Coming into the game, I was 0-for-2 as far as playing well against West Virginia," Roe said, referring to his 2.0-point average in two previous games against the Mountaineers. "I just wanted to come in and make a statement.

"Since it was on ESPN, I wanted to show people that Lou Roe can play ball," he said.

And when the cameras shine, so does the 6-foot-7 forward.

When Calipari was asked in the post-game interview about Roe's play, he turned to Jim McCoy and Anton Brown and asked them, "When does Lou Roe play?"

"On TV," the two seniors were quick to respond.

"The minute those TV guys pop their cameras on, my man jumps up and he plays," Calipari said, as Roe has scored 34 points and 24 rebounds in UMass' three previous games televised on the national network. "He gets on TV and he's unbelievable."

Last Saturday night, Roe, who was the New Jersey High School Player of the Year last season when he averaged 26.1 points and 15 rebounds at Atlantic City High, was named to the A-10 All-Freshman team.

"Lou's been playing well in practice everyday," Brown said. "And when you practice well, it shows.

"He had a lack of confidence at the beginning of the year," Brown said. "But, Coach Calipari told him, 'Lou, we need you to win,' and I think he took that to heart."

Roe spent most of his floor time defending West Virginia's second-leading scoerer, 6-foot-8, 225-pound sophomore, Ricky Robinson.

"He's a big strong kid, but I just held my own," Roe said.

When asked about Roe, West Virginia coach Gale Catlett was brief and to the point.

"He's excellent," he said. "He's a great player."

Minutemen taste sweet victory

Move on to the sweet 16 with win over Syracuse

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER — Before last night's game University of Massachusetts center Harper Williams had made just one 3-point shot this season. So he was not exactly the guy the Minutemen expected to shoot a trey, let alone hit one.

However, Williams had no choice but to fire away, from, what for him is unchartered territory, because the shot clock was about to expire.

Moments after he released the shot, the partisan Centrum crowd erupted into a frenzy, as Williams' buzzer-beater hit nothing but the bottom of the net, giving the Minutemen a 74-70 lead with :30 left in overtime of yesterday's second round NCAA East Regional game.

When it was all said and done, the Minutemen had defeated Big East Champion Syracuse, 77-71, and advanced to the Sweet 16, where they will face the University of Kentucky Thursday night in Philadelphia.

"I practice three-point shots just in case of an emergency," Williams said. "I knew it was good the second it left my hand. Time was running out. I had to shoot otherwise we would have had a turnover."

"I looked at his hand, then I turned and looked at the bottom of the net and that's where the shot fell," said Syracuse forward Dave Johnson.

The Minutemen had a chance to win the game during regulation, as William Herndon stole the ball after a UMass miss, with the Minutemen leading 64-62 and :46 remaining. He passed off to Jim McCoy (24 points) who proceeded to dribble around, but slipped and was whistled for traveling.

University of Massachusetts coach John Calipari and guard Anton Brown embrace after an emotional 77-71 overtime victory.

"I was trying to get fouled but I slipped," McCoy said. "I think everyone on the bench was getting ready to kill me. All I thought about was going home on the bus with an 'L'. Or me not going home with the bus. I just wanted to keep my head in the game because I knew the team was going to need me further into the game."

He was right. After Williams (18 points, 15 rebounds) scored the first two points of the overtime period to give the Minutemen a 66-64 advantage, McCoy nailed two free throws to up the ante to four. In fact, UMass' all-time leading scorer, connected on 6 of 6 free throws in OT (8 of 10 for the game).

The Orangemen sent the game into overtime after Johnson backed Lou Roe into the post, turned and scored. McCoy's leaner at the buzzer fell short and it was on to the extra session.

After falling behind 68-64, the Orangemen tied the game at 68 when Lawrence Moten weaved his way between defenders and banked home 2 of his 19 points.

Down the other end, McCoy got fouled and hit two clutch free throws to give UMass, which never trailed in overtime, a 70-68 lead with 2:33 remaining.

From there, Tony Barbee drove the baseline for an easy two to give the Minutemen (30-4) a 72-68 edge.

Johnson, who led all scorers with 26 points to go along with his 10 rebounds, hit a short jumper and was fouled, cutting the lead to 1, 72-71 with 1:15 remaining, setting up Williams' heroics.

"Harper's shot looked good," said a frustrated and upset Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim. "I think that's the play they diagramed."

Student can't escape the Bronx at Amherst C.

By JEFF DONN
Associated Press

AMHERST, Mass. — Angel Ortiz studies literature and political theory at Amherst College, but his thoughts often dwell on gunshots, food stamps, welfare and where to find cash for his next trip home.

Like many children of poverty who have climbed to the upper echelons of American educations, Ortiz remains bound by the economic and emotional chains of his youth. Indeed, educators and advocates say wealth and social disparities make higher education an unequal opportunity in the 1990s — even at top schools with deep pockets and fierce commitments to fairness.

"The reality of the Bronx is my reality," Ortiz said. "I am grateful to be here, but in a lot of ways I feel I shouldn't be. My mind tells me I should be home helping my family. I should be working. I should be dead."

Ortiz' burdens at home are far from unique. According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 9.4 percent of U.S. families had incomes less than $10,000 in 1990.

His academic success, though, sets him apart. Only 6 percent of freshmen at private, four-year colleges in 1991 came from families earning less than $10,000. Low-income freshmen represented only 2.8 percent of the student body at private universities.

Ortiz could easily have missed their ranks. The 21-year-old senior grew up amid the squalor and gang violence of a housing project in New York City. His father often was without work. Ortiz' family survived on food stamps.

His mother, now separated from his father, still lives on welfare with six of Ortiz' seven brothers and sisters.

He took the first step out of poverty when, as a talented public school student, he caught the eye of Prep for Prep, a private group that funnels low-income students to top schools. With its help, Ortiz gained a scholarship at a private high school in Manhattan and later enrolled at Amherst, one of the country's top liberal arts colleges.

"I think a lot of young people like Angel end up at community colleges or not going past high school, said Gary Simons, a former Bronx elementary school teacher who now directs Prep for Prep. Some of them unfortunately get pulled into the negative stuff that goes on in the neighborhood.

It has taken tens of thousands of dollars, in addition to Ortiz' own exceptional talents and commitment, to propel him.

Like many other disadvantaged students at leading schools, Ortiz receives nearly all his tuition — about $17,000 this year — in scholarship from the college. He uses nearly $4,000 in state and federal grants for low-income students to cover room, board, books and living expenses.

Still, he finds himself without ready money for trips home in emergencies, like when his brother was beaten up or his mother got sick with cancer. He has worn the same pair of sneakers for years.

Despite his intellectual growth and B average, Ortiz says he has always felt out of place in the rolling hills, cloistered classrooms, and the old-money affluence of this campus in western Massachusetts.

Students on break hospitalized

Mass. students overcome by carbon monoxide leak

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. (AP) — Three college students on spring break from Massachusetts remained in critical condition Sunday from the near-fatal effects of a carbon monoxide leak in a hotel, officials said.

Rescue personnel first thought the trio had severe sunburns or had overdosed on drugs because their skin had turned a deep red. Then an officer collapsed and began vomiting, and the rescuers realized the coloring was a sign of gas poisoning.

"When they turn cherry red it's pretty severe," said city Fire Chief Robert Rehr, who helped evacuate the 200-room Holiday Inn-Airport on Friday after a maid reported finding the three students. "That's advance stages of carbon monoxide poisoning."

The three, reportedly students at Middlesex Community College in Lowell, Mass., had return plane tickets for later that night, family members said.

Todd Girouard, 21, of Chelmsford, Mass., was in critical but stable condition Sunday in the coronary care unit of St. Mary's Hospital in West Palm Beach, said nursing supervisor Eileen Burdette.

Doctors had initially put him in a hyperbaric chamber, a device that uses extremely high pressure to push oxygen through the blood, but transferred him to heart unit when his condition destabilized.

"I only hope they were not without oxygen for too long. The police collapsed when they were in the room five minutes. Those kids were probably in there from the night before," Girouard's grandmother told the Boston Herald, which did not give her name.

Kimberly Newton, 21, of Brockton, Mass., and Kirsten Madden, 20, of Groton, Mass., were in critical condition Sunday at Mercy Hospital in Miami, where they also were given hyperbaric treatment, said hospital spokeswoman Odalys Lloret.

The hotel was still closed Sunday.

"We will remain closed until we can make sure everything is safe and get clearance from the authorities," said general manager George Berwig.

It's not clear how long the three were exposed to fumes from the gas-fired boiler, which heats water for the hotel, Rehr said. But by the time a housekeeper discovered them and called for help Friday afternoon, the gas had spread to three floors.

Firefighters used fans to clear the air from the 11-story hotel Friday evening by early Saturday morning, and the hotel remained closed as the management brought in experts to study the leak.

Informant gets threat in shape of lamb's head

By TONY ROGERS
Associated Press

BOSTON — It seemed like a fairly routine crime — someone was filching equipment from a computer company. Routine, that is, until an informant in the case received the severed, bloodied head of a lamb in the mail.

Now the case has taken on the bizarre hue of underworld crime, and federal authorities are looking for a culprit and wondering if more nefarious forces are involved.

Roger Cox, the informant's attorney, said the defendants in the case are sending his client a message.

"They want to scare him into keeping his mouth shut," Cox said Thursday.

While the incident recalls the film The Godfather, in which mobsters leave a horse's head in a movie producer's bed as a threat, federal prosecutors won't comment on whether the case might have links to the Mafia.

But Edith Flynn, a professor of criminology at Northeastern University specializing in organized crime, said the act had all the marks of Mafia involvement.

"My guess is that once the prosecution is done, you'll find the fingerprints of organized crime behind this," Flynn said.

Edward Desmond Jr., 28, had helped the government during its 2 1/2-year probe that led to the July 1991 indictment of 16 people - including Desmond - on charges of stealing $6 million in equipment from Digital Equipment Corp.

Desmond was in his Lexington home Feb. 28 when the postman delivered a white box with a Boston postmark.

"Ed wasn't expecting a package," Cox said. "He opened it up and here's this hideous severed lamb's head. When he called me his voice was shaking."

Gotti a 'goofy godfather'

Tapes depict mobster as talkative

By RICK HAMPSON
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Once hailed as a criminal mastermind, John Gotti has emerged at his racketeering trial as a goofy godfather who violated the underworld's rules: No drug dealers, no loose talk, no blatant tax dodging. And no losing money on your own games.

Witnesses and surveillance tapes have shown Gotti surrounding himself with heroin traffickers, talking constantly about his activities, repeatedly failing to file tax returns and losing large sums at the gambling operations that were his alleged source of income.

Gotti may be intelligent — he's reported to have an I.Q. of around 140 — and even his critics gave him credit for a certain low cunning. What else would explain his rise from lowly mob associate in 1977 to boss of the mighty Gambino crime family in 1985? And his acquittal in three trials in five years?

But FBI tapes, prosecution testimony and Gotti's own words at his trial have made the Dapper Don look like a dummy.

For instance, before the Super Bowl, Gotti advised courthouse reporters to take Buffalo and the points. Washington won and covered the point spread easily.

The real question is why anyone would listen to Gotti. Government bugs show he's not the luckiest gambler.

Gotti and three partners put up $120,000 a decade ago to start an illegal casino.

Labor Party pushes forward in British poll

By MAUREEN JOHNSON
Associated Press

RISCA, Wales — Stirring old passions in his native Wales and exuding new confidence as his Labor Party nudges ahead, Neil Kinnock has established a formidable challenge for power.

One week into the campaign for Britian's April 9 election, continuing bad economic news has put Conservative Prime Minister John Major on the defensive.

A fiery and eloquent platform speaker, Kinnock, 49, is also a natural street campaigner: thrusting into crowds on the main street of Ricsa, a former mining town in his Islywn parliamentary district, clutching outstretched hands, hugging old ladies, remembering names, inquiring after an ailing husband.

"Neil's a boy from the valleys and a man of the people, and he's going to make a wonderful prime minister," Dorothy Phillips said as Kinnock and his wife, Glenys, swept down the main street this weekend.

On the fringes of the Kinnock crowd, Conservative candidate Peter Bone cut a lonely figure, trying to hand out leaflets. There were a few shouts of "Tory scum."

Kinnock was born near here, the son of a coal miner. The Conservative government has shut dozens of unprofitable mines, and the last colliery in this district closed three years ago.

The towns with their humble slate row houses now have government-subsidized light industries. But the traditions live on: the ethos of socialist heroes, of being working class and voting Labor.

Along a nearby highway, painters have been at work on Conservative Party billboards, neatly altering "can't" to "can" in the "You can't trust Labor" slogan.

Here they've always voted Labor, unswerving through 13 years of Conservative government, through Labor's lurch left in the 80's and then Kinnock's sharp switch to the center since a third successive election defeat in 1987.

The election will not be won in Wales, however, but in Tory territory in England where Labor needs to gain nearly a hundred seats.

Opinion polls hwo the race is tight. The BBC's "poll of polls," combining three surveys published in Sunday newspapers, showed Labor 2 points ahead.

Rats in the Campus Pond

Heeding the advice of a local Amherst resident, fair warning is hereby given that, due to a menacing colony of black sewer rats, the UMass Campus Pond should be avoided at all costs. According to an anonymous woman wearing a baseball cap and a pair of muddy gardening boots, the area around the pond has, for the past 20 years, been nothing but a disease-ridden spawning pool for dangerous vermin, and in order to prevent the spread of rabies and ringworm, those students who pass the pond on a regular basis should take all possible measures to map out alternate routes across campus. This information was revealed to me on the bus from Northampton to Amherst while an associate and I were casually entertaining the thought of staging an intramural kayak war on the pond.

Amanda Jost

"I don't know," I said, somewhere in the conversation. "Isn't that water pretty nasty? What if you. . . got some of it. . . on you?"

"Oh, it's clean," my associate said. "Clean enough, anyway."

Just then, a new voice interrupted. "Don't go near that pond!"

Turning my head, I saw for the first time the horrified countenance of my advisor in this matter: a stranger on the bus, a woman at least 40 but probably not yet 50, carrying a lot of stuff and wearing a baseball cap and gardening boots. She was shaking her head vigorously.

"There's rats in there! Big, vicious rats that attack you as you walk by."

"Really?" Immediate interest from my associate. "How do you know?"

"Seen 'em," she explained, holding her arms as far apart as she could without dislocating her shoulders. "They're this big."

"Gee. . . cat-sized rats."

"Yep. You ever seen a cat near the Campus Pond?" the woman asked.

I shook my head, wondering if the logic she assumed was really there.

"All right then," she continued. "I'm serious. They're mean and they run right at you if they see you. They're fast and you know what? The thing about 'em is they have blazing green eyes. Most people don't know that, and a lot don't believe it either, but I'm not lying to you. I've got no reason to lie to you. I don't even know you. Let me tell you, 20 years ago I was coming out of Bartlett, walking straight towards the pond, and when I got on the grass about 30 feet away from the waters' edge, I saw one of them and it came at me. So I beat it off with a stick. I don't know, it might have been a broom handle."

"You had a broom handle with you?" my associate was amazed, convinced we were talking with the mother of McGyver.

"No, I walked back to Bartlett to get it. I had seen it lying there, I don't remember, on the ground or against the stairs or something, but I went back to get it, and I whacked that rat back to wherever he came from."

"Good deal."

"What color was he?"

"Black," she hissed in disgust.

"I've got a pet rat," I told her, thinking about my sweet Ichabod, who wasn't even close in size to this woman's arm span. "He's black."

"Eccecth! Why in the hell would you want a pet rat? You should get rid of it. Haven't you read any Edgar Allen Poe, about the rats in prisons? All of that is true, you know. Haven't you read any Poe?"

"He's one of my favorites."

"You should get rid of it. In New York there are rats in the apartments and they come in the middle of the night and they kill newborns and bite little children. They act just like beasts. They run in packs and nobody does anything to get rid of them, so they just take over, having babies in the walls. . . people should kill them. A pet rat is a lot different from a big old sewer rat. That's what they are, sewer rats. In New York City and right here at UMass."

At this point, the bus rolled to a stop in front of the Fine Arts Center, where my associate and I had planned to get off. He seemed rather anxious, but I was in no hurry. We stood up and I said to the woman, "Well, thanks for the advice. It's good to meet people around here who really know what's going on. I'll spread the word, you know, about the rats, so no one will get bitten."

"That's a good idea," she said. "The University isn't going to do anything about it, so all we can do is stay away. Stay away from the pond and those rats, because they come at you. I'm not lying to you. I've no reason to lie to you, I don't even know you."

Walking back to the Campus Center, my associate and I made sure to scan the edge of the pond for anything big and black with blazing green eyes, but all we saw was a dried-up looking toad and a lot of trash. Maybe they're all gone now; the woman had said that all of this happened 20 years ago. In any case, I still think we should be on guard, and carry broomsticks with us. . . or at least figure out where they keep them in Bartlett.

New security systems ineffective

I am writing in regards to the new security systems now being tested at various Southwest towers. I find these new systems of great annoyance. What ever happened to a good old key? Now I must punch in a code, show my ID to security and unlock the door to the elevator. Is this my dorm or Fort Knox?

Obviously any steps forward in security are a plus, however, the new systems are just not working. If, for instance, I did not live in JFK and wanted entrance, I would simply wait for someone to operate the system. Most of the people in favor of these insufficient modes of security are not subject to use them. Resident directors and assistant resident directors are some of the privileged, entrusted individuals whose keys still operate the front door. Furthermore, I find it an infringement of my rights to have "Big Brother" record the time of every entrance into my home. Hopefully, in the future, the people responsible for these new, ineffective security systems will start spending the limited cash resources more wisely.

My opinions are louder than yours

The most impressive part of the montage of life in the Pioneer Valley is the general mellow attitude. It has some of what is called a small town feel; to wit, it is much easier to talk to people. The spontaneously formed knots of conversation have been on occasion nothing short of awe-inspiring, especially when it comes to politics. Face it, when you want a good argument, I mean the kind that you will look back on fondly, it's easier here than in any other part of the state. A good conversation is better than almost anything.

Unfortunately, many a conversation I've heard in the Valley has degenerated into a shouting match. It can be fascinating to watch, but a shouting match (supposedly) proves your opinions are superior because you're louder than your opponent. The main problem with shouting matches are they are physically draining and if you happen to be one of the people on the periphery, you not only cannot get in a word edgewise unless you start shouting louder than the other people, but you can't hear anything for at least an hour after due to short-term hearing loss.

The problem with trying to be your own soul in the Valley are the legions who assure you they know better than you do, and if you don't agree with them, you're scum. These people are the minority, but keep a high profile, and are hard to shut out.

A second problem is these people take themselves far too seriously as a rule. Life seems to be a struggle for them, and if it isn't, they'll mope until it is again. Do they ever stop to smell the flowers or feed the ducks or just plain take a break? I wonder.

The art of the argument is the give and take, being able to get your opponents to accept your viewpoints every now and then, and conceding points to them when they seem to be right. I ask you, which kind of argument leaves you more satisfied in the end: one where you can discuss things in a vaguely rational fashion or one where you end up shouting at each other until you cough up a lung?

Columnist goes on reckless, nine-day television binge

The minute I returned to my cellar in Springfield, I cracked open a box of sugar cubes and hooked myself up with a nice, tall, cool glass of iced Listerine and watched TV for nine days. I was kept wide awake by the cocaine I ingested on the third day, you know, when I needed to rise again. Anyway, you might think drugs are bad for you but TV preaches the contrary.

In between Love Boat and Star Search at 2 a.m., I saw a pro-drug commercial. The viewer sees a white egg and a faceless voice intones, "This is your brain." Suddenly, a hand cracks the egg and spills the inside contents onto a frying pan and the voice says, "This is your brain on drugs. Any questions?"

Not me! You see, the commercial is communicating to us that all of our brains are enclosed in a confined shell and are extremely fragile. However, with the use of drugs, our brains are liberated of their former enclosed barriers, and are allowed to expand in all directions once the egg is cracked open. Bypassing the constraints of their previous jail cells, our brains become free to explore heretofore unknown frontiers.

Regardless of this new consciousness in the area of shedding our society's previous unnecessary paranoia about drugs, the future does not look too bright. I watched "Star Trak (I spell it the way I pronounce it) The New Generation," which is set on a spaceship exploring new frontiers (back to the mind-expanding motif) in the 23rd century or so. And wouldn't you know it, but on this starship of the future an old White guy is the captain, and his second in command is a young White guy. Other characters include a 16-year-old White male genius, a large, hairy, dark-skinned fellow a la Chewbacca, and to insure that tokenism exists in the 23rd century, there is also another Black guy who speaks more colorfully but less eloquently than the other characters, not to mention an android who is made in the likeness of, you guessed it, a White male.

Tony Westcott

Women on the "Enterprise" play similar, less dominant roles. There is a short, feisty, blonde woman named Tasha, who my roommate tells me, had sex with a robot. Also, there is a sexy, voluptuous woman relegated to the position of counselor (you know about women and their emotions), portrayed by a former porn movie star, which came in handy during the episode where she is raped by one of them dirty, old White men with power and wealth. Lastly, the doctor on board is a female. But, as you could imagine, she's also the single mother of the 16-year-old genius who will probably take over her job next season. I don't even want to get into the manifest destiny philosophy of this crew of space explorers or the reason why we Earthlings finally got around to leaving our planet—maybe Earth will be totally ruined by the 23rd century. No thanks, my future only extends so far as the next UMass basketball game.

But while we're on the subject, I did see parts of the game Friday, while flipping between MTV. This combination gave me a good idea. You know how MTV has the power to turn things into major media successes? Look at Ren & Stimpy, Nirvana, the Monty Python revival and who could forget what MTV did for The Monkees of all things back in '86. Well, I propose that that nasty rock group, The Pixies, do a video for their song, "UMass," and film it right here on our campus.

Just think if we could get everyone to turn out for some shots, maybe carrying signs saying "Save Our Decrepit Library!" Or hell, man, just take some shots of students with sleeping bags waiting in line for basketball tickets and make it look like a budget cut/raised tuition sit-in protest of some sort. Or hey, who needs MTV and The Pixies anyway? If students here will go out of their way (and minds) to sleep outside to acquire tickets to a sports event where tall boys try to throw a bouncy, orange sphere through a net, and wave their hands to distract and prevent another schools' tall boys from successfully throwing the ball through their corresponding net, certainly we would do something to prohibit our library from becoming the worst in the nation. I mean, we are a school after all, and we certainly show a community spirit when it comes to our sports teams, or at least one of them, but wouldn't it be nice if our generation cared enough about our future to prevent something like the picture of the 23rd century I saw during my spring break? Well, hey, if you have any ideas or comments, don't bother me because I'll be watching TV. . .

UMass undergrad runs her own dance school

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

RUTLAND — "Smile! Keep those toes POINTED!" Laurel Conrad's voice echoes above the sounds of Jesus Jones in the cassette player. This group of second and third grade jazz students are rehearsing on the top floor of the town hall in Rutland, Massachusetts. The Laurel Conrad School of Dance has classes meet every Saturday in this unlikely location.

En Pointe

Each Saturday Laurel is there holding classes from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. The classes include students age 3 through high school.

"A nine hour day goes by like nothing," says Laurel, a 21-year-old full time student at the University of Massachusetts, who has been dancing for 16 years.

She has been running the school since last September when she was asked by her former dance instructor, Cathy Scarbeau, to take over. The school was formerly known as the Scarbeau School of Dance.

"As many of you already know Laurel assisted me for many years at my school and is a very dedicated and creative dancer and teacher. She is very knowledgable about the correct anatomical way to teach dance. I feel a great sense of relief in knowing that my students will be in the best of hands," wrote Scarbeau in her farewell letter to her students before she moved to Florida.

Laurel has been trained in Jazz, Ballet, and Modern Dance.

She confesses an affinity to Modern. "I love Alvin Ailey's dance troupe," she says.

Laurel has been a student in the UMass Dance Department from 1989 to 1991, and a student in the Scarbeau School of Dance from 1981 to 1989.

She has choreographed several musicals in her community from Wachussett Regional High School's productions to the Summer Community Music Program.

"I don't want to give up dancing. There is so much inside of me. Now I have a means to do it, " says Laurel.

Her teaching methods as well as the dances themselves are creative and energetic. Laurel has the mini ballerinas in her kindergarten-first grade class form two lines to perform a ballet relay race. Instead of the traditional baton, they pass their silver crowns to the waiting teammate who then dons the head wear and leaps her way across the hard wood floor.

This same creativity is apparent when choreographing the 14 and 15-year-olds' toe shoe classes. The girls all spring up en pointe to the sounds of The Planets, which is not exactly your traditional ballet tune.

"I wouldn't give up anything about it [the school.] There aren't any drawbacks. I know I'm playing a role model. It's tough to live up to these girls' expectations. It's great to know I'm making such an impact on these little lives," says Laurel.

"I'm teaching them. It's neat to watch the learning process. After I tell them they are doing something wrong, and I show them the right way and they're still doing it the wrong way — I'll say it in a different way. The little light goes on. You can see it," she laughs.

"I love the three-year-olds, but I love the older kids because they can do real choreography. I can relate to all of the different levels," Laurel admits.

"Before I came to UMass, I did not have strict enough training. I'm not saying that my teachers were bad, but I wish I had gotten a little more. Now I can stress points that I wasn't given. [Umass Professor] Richard Jones, who passed away last year, was spectacular. He was very technical," says Laurel.

As for her future plans Laurel says, "That's the most vague aspect of my life. I wish I could make something up, but I can't." She is considering changing her major next semester, but dancing will always play a role in her life. Laurel is performing on a harbor cruise in Boston this summer. The wait staff performs a Broadway Revue on a little stage, after the dinner is served.

Laurel admits that with a course load in Amherst, teaching once a week in Rutland, and her job in Boston, "My life is spread across Massachusetts! But my Mom does so much, and I get a lot of help from my whole family."

Now, we are becoming the men we wanted to marry. Once women trained to marry doctors, not be one.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Put your thoughts on paper instead of calling long-distance. It is possible to get out in the evening without spending a fortune. Make certain the clothes you wear are in good taste.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Visiting friends gives your spirits a lift. Go with the flow. Your home can be the perfect setting for a festive family gathering. Plan activities all ages can enjoy.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Keep your mind on your work. You have a chance to advance if you use the right techniques. Who you know is a terrific plus. Do not become unraveled if a romance falters.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be flexible in your closest relationships. You need to give a little, especially when it comes to affairs of the heart. The business outlook is golden.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You must get down to business in order to make your dreams come true. Ask yourself why you are such a procrastinator. Your co-workers' cooperation is essential to progress at work.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You attract members of the opposite sex without even trying. Your living conditions improve dramatically once you make certain changes. Always insisting on having your own way will alienate others.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Even routine tasks may not seem so dull after a weekend spent away from the job. Plunge right in; be on the lookout for an opportunity for advancement.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Set your sights on a specific objective and go after it. Although other people may call you a dreamer, you can succeed. Guard your health by getting enough rest.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Seek a professional opinion before tying yourself down to any kind of business agreement. You need to know more about a prospective partner.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Find a way to make your routine more productive. Once family and career obligations have been met, try the social scene. You may be able to combine business with pleasure this evening.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): You may not make much headway today. Taking a long-range view will keep you from feeling frustrated. Do not make important decisions on the spur of the moment.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Make a fresh start today and streamline work procedures. Pay more attention to your appearance. If you believe romance is out of the question, think again!

Player of the game

Harper Williams
6'7" Jr. F/C
Bridgeport, CT

University of Massachusetts forward Harper Williams pulled down a game-high 15 rebounds and scored 18 points including a decisive 3-pointer in overtime with only one second remaining on the 45-second shot clock. It was the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year's third double-double in the last four games. Williams also had two steals and one blocked shot.

Why UMass won

Even though the Minutemen hit only 40 percent of their shots for the game, each and every one seemed key, as the Atlantic 10 Champions held their own against the Big East Champions, never falling behind by more than eight throughout the contest. UMass, which had only been in one overtime contest this year (a 74-69 win over West Virginia), jumped out to an early lead in the extra session and never looked back as Jim McCoy and Harper Williams came up big. McCoy connected on all six of his free throw attempts while Williams scored two field goals, including a 3.

UMass' next opponent

The Minutemen will face the other team that escaped from Worcester unbeaten, the No. 2 seeded Kentucky Wildcats. Kentucky, which was victorious over Iowa State yesterday 106-98, beat the Minutemen in early December in Lexington, 90-69.

UMass slips past Syracuse with 77-71 overtime thriller

the second half, was simply outmanned. The Orangemen used eight players, but four went 40-plus minutes with Johnson going the entire 45. The Minutemen on the other hand used nine guys and got another fine effort off the bench from freshman Lou Roe, who scored 10 points and grabbed 7 rebounds in 19 minutes.

Roe, who averages over 11 points per game, when the games are on national television, compared to his usual 7.7 points per game, scored 19 in Friday's 85-58 first round victory over Fordham.

Anton Brown glides in for 2 of his 10 points in yesterday's UMass win over Syracuse, 77-71.

Boeheim would not admit his team was fatigued, but it was obvious, as during several key stretches, the Orangemen were breathing heavy and coming up short on jumpers.

"We've struggled all year with teams that can hurt us on the boards," Boeheim, whose team was outrebounded 46-37, said. "We made a good play to get the game into overtime. They made a tough shot to put the game away."

The key point in the game came just after Williams rebounded a miss and put it back up to draw the Minutemen within 3, 45-42. That is when UMass coach John Calipari exhorted the subdued Centrum crowd to make noise. The fans responded to Calipari's tirade on the sideline and for the remainder of the game were almost as loud as the Curry Hicks Cage — almost.

Give the fans credit too, because just as soon as they stood up, they could have sat back down when Conrad McRae slammed home two of his 14 points to give Syracuse a 47-42 lead.

However, the Minutemen, with the fan support, went on a 14-4 run to open up a 56-50 lead.

"The crowd didn't bother us," Johnson said. "We've played in much tougher games in our conference."

"We've had three years in a row of playing in a tough place," Boeheim said. "Last year we played Richmond in Richmond and lost, the year before we played in Dayton and lost."

At halftime, the Orangemen held a 32-30 lead on the strength of 16 Johnson points.

"Halftime was ugly," Calipari said. "Very ugly. Harper and I got at it, but he came back and played an outstanding half of basketball."

Moten scored four quick points to bring the Orangemen within 2, 56-54.

University of Massachusetts forward Lou Roe has a firm grip on the ball during yesterday's game.

Williams' two free throws gave UMass a 61-58 advantage and Herndon could have given the Minutemen a five point lead, but he missed two free throws.

For the game, UMass, which has struggled from the charity stripe throughout the season (66.1 percent) hit 18 of 25 freebies (72.0 percent).

After UMass held Syracuse, Herndon again was fouled with 2:10 left in regulation. This time, he hit one free throw and the Minutemen had a 62-58 lead.

McRae's dunk brought the Orangemen within 2, but two McCoy foul shots made it 64-60 with 1:34 on the clock.

Harper Williams . . . for three?

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER — Harper Williams says he shoots 3-pointers in practice, "just in case of an emergency."

Thank goodness for emergencies.

And Harper Williams says he's "a 3-point shooter."

Thank goodness he thinks so.

And Harper Williams said he knew his 3-point shot last night was going to fall, "when it left my hand."

Thank goodness it did.

Because it was Williams' 3-pointer with a fraction of a second on the shot clock which gave UMass a decisive four-point lead in overtime against Syracuse yesterday and led to the Minutemen's 77-71 victory in the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

But Williams is the last person on the team expected to attempt a crucial 3-pointer as he has only attempted five all season (eight career), connecting on one.

"He wants to be a 3-point shooter," Calipari said.

"I am a 3-point shooter," Williams, the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, immediately responded. "I don't make all of them, but I am a 3-point shooter."

So Harper, if you are a 3-point shooter tell us about the last time you hit one?

"I made another this season," he said with pride. "And it was off the dribble . . . it was nice."

However, Williams almost never got the opportunity to take THE SHOT.

Jim McCoy inbounded the ball to Will Herndon, who was unaware there was just six seconds remaining on the shot clock as he casually dribbled to his right.

Williams frantically called for the ball at the top of the 3-point arc, well-aware of them quickly closing on a 45-second violation.

Harper Williams looks for a way around Syracuse center Conrad McRae yesterday. Williams finished with 18 points and 15 rebounds.

"I said 'Hern, Hern give me the ball,' and I had to shoot it," Williams said.

And that he did as it got all net.

But sorry Harper, that's not how the team planned it.

"I thought the play was to go to Jimmy [McCoy] and Anton [Brown] threw the ball in to me and I dribbled out and Harper [Williams] called for the ball," Herndon said. "And I passed it to him and he saw how much time was on the clock and . . . it doesn't matter. We won."

"There's a drill in practice that's six minutes long and in the last minute I shoot 3-pointers," Williams said. "The coaches tell me to shoot inside shots, but I said I can't play center at a higher level of basketball."

UN confirms Iraqi missile destruction

By NABILA MEGALLI
Associated Press

MANAMA, Bahrain — A United Nations team of ballistic missile experts has confirmed that Iraq destroyed and buried a number of Scud missiles and other terror weapons, team leader Derek Boothby said Monday.

Boothby said there are more than one of the so-called "graveyard sites," which could contain some of the weaponry Baghdad has been suspected of hiding from U.N. teams inspecting Iraq's weapons programs.

"There are quite a few places," Boothby said by satellite telephone shortly after returning from the field on his second day of a mission to verify Iraq's weekend disclosures on its stock of mass destruction weapons.

Bowing to world pressure after a showdown with Iraqi Deputy Premier Tariq Aziz at the Security Council, Iraq's delegate to the United Nations last Friday said substantial quantities of weapons of mass destruction were destroyed in June.

Boothby's 35-member team went to Baghdad on Saturday to verify the Iraqi statements, which have forestalled possible military intervention from the United States and Britain. The U.S.-led allies forced Iraq from Kuwait in 1991 in the Gulf War, and Iraq's weapons must be destroyed under the cease-fire agreement.

Boothby said he visited one site south of Baghdad on Sunday, and two north of Baghdad on Monday. He said there was "no consistency" as to where the Iraqis had buried the destroyed missiles. "One of the sites was in the countryside, in the middle of trees, and one in an open, sandy, gravel area."

Boothby would not specify the numbers of the long-range missiles that he hopes to count in the wreckage.

Nor would he discuss the numbers Iraq reported to the U.N. Special Commission in charge of eliminating the country's nuclear, chemical and biological warfare capability, as well as its stock of missiles with a range of 100 miles or more.

"I am under strict instructions not to get into numbers," he said.

"The Iraqis are still in the process of showing us wreckage. They've shown us some and will be showing some more."

At its New York headquarters, the commission issued a statement that "initial excavation revealed some pieces of the missiles," and the Iraqis were asked to excavate the areas completely.

Douglas Englund, the New York-based director of operation of the commission, noted "press reports" said Iraq had reported 89 Scuds in the wreckage.

Sixty-one missiles were destroyed under the supervision of an inspection team last year, but U.S. officials claim Iraq has hundreds of Scuds still hidden.

Libya offers bombing suspects

Concession seen as attempt to avoid UN sanctions

By PETER JAMES SPIELMANN
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Libya has offered to surrender two men suspected in the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 to the Arab League for eventual trial in the United States or Britain, the Security Council president said Monday.

The offer marked a major Libyan concession as it seeks to avoid U.N. Security economic and diplomatic sanctions being pushed by the United States, Britain and France.

London and Washington seek the extradition of the two Libyans for bombing the New York-bound Pan Am plane over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988. France seeks four others for the bombing of a French airliner over Africa in 1989. A total of 441 people died in the attacks.

Libyan Ambassador Ali Ahmed Elhouderi announced the plan to turn over the accused to the Arab League while talking with reporters at the United Nations.

"We hope this can put an end to this unnecessary confrontation," Elhouderi said.

Elhouderi said it would be up to the 21-member Arab League to decide the fate of the Lockerbie suspects.

U.S. Ambassador Thomas R. Pickering was noncommittal on whether the United States would now stop pushing for further sanctions. "We are waiting to hear that these people will take the actions they are supposed to take," he said.

The Security Council president, Ambassador Diego Arria of Venezuela, said he believes the suspects would be "unconditionally surrendered to the Arab League and unconditionally surrendered" to U.N. Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

Arria also said he understood the men — Abdel Basset Ali Megrahi, 39, and Lamen Khalifa Fhimah, 35, — "most definitely" could be handed over for trial to the United States or Britain.

Boutros-Ghali said he believes "the Arab League must receive the two accused Libyans and hand them over... in the presence of a U.N. representative."

The United States, Pickering said, has "no objection to turning the men over to the secretary-general without conditions if they are turned over to one of our governments."

At an emergency meeting Sunday in Cairo, the Arab League urged the Security Council to hold off on sanctions and give mediation a chance to resolve the dispute.

Arab diplomats said Boutros-Ghali had interceded with his fellow Egyptian diplomat, Esmat Abdel-Meguid, the Arab League secretary general.

A new Security Council resolution would have clamped an international arms embargo on Libya for not cooperating with British, French and U.S. extradition requests.

The resolution also would cut off commercial air links to Libya. It also would urge nations to expel most Libyan diplomats.

Pickering said later Monday that the resolution was still possible. "There is little pause now while we digest what it is the Libyans have to say," he said.

The resolution appeared to have enough support to barely pass the 15-member council with 10 votes. China was considered likely to abstain, while the other four members with veto power — the United States, Britain, France and Russia — would vote yes.

Mather offers students career start

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Correspondent

With the approach of summer many students feel they are doomed to hunt for fast-food jobs flipping burgers or babysitting the neighborhood's bratty kids. But with a little effort, a summer job in New York or Boston is not so far away.

The Mather Career Center can help, just as it has assisted thousands of students in getting jobs related to their major. According to the center's associate director Jeffrey Silver, approximately 100 less students are applying for co-ops and internships than last year. Despite the recession, the center is offering more jobs than in years past.

"To graduate with no experience is crazy. Many companies will only interview people with experience from a co-op or internship," Silver said.

The Career Center offers internships and co-ops. The internship program allows students to work within their major and get credit. Because students are not getting paid, their job will sometimes be higher up the corporate ladder.

Senior David Gorvine did an six-month internship at NBC Sports in New York, while earning 12 credits for his communications major. Gorvine said he not only got to work with the high executives including the president and manager of NBC Sports, but also gained the experience in handling videotape.

"It was an energized working atmosphere, rather than sitting in an office," Gorvine said.

Gorvine said he often saw celebrities in NBC studios. He also said he has gotten to know many executives in other networks as well.

"Because I worked at NBC, I will be able to walk right into the office and give them my resume," he said.

"Yet no students this year applied to work at NBC. It just doesn't make sense," Silver said.

Co-ops are also a popular way to gain experience. Usually co-ops run for six months, but some are only for the summer. In the past the difference between a co-op and an internship was that co-ops were paid but not for credit, but that is changing. In may co-ops you can earn credit in addition to being paid, according to Silver.

Micheal Chan and Debra Robert, both seniors in chemical engineering, participated in the six month co-op program at America Cyanamid Company and did research and development. Robert first started with a summer co-op.

"The people at Mather are very supportive... [My supervisor] is trying to help me get a summer job in Houston," Chan said.

Many companies want freshman and sophomores in addition to juniors and seniors, said Silver.

Junior civil engineering major Michael Graham said he found his job as an engineering draftsman with the Navy chal-

Foxboro to be World Cup site

By ANNE STUART
Associated Press

BOSTON — Cheering people flung soccer balls across an auditorium while others simply hugged and kissed each other when they learned Foxboro Stadium was among nine sites picked Monday for the 1994 World Cup.

"Well, it was suspenseful," said Robert L. Caporale, chairman of Boston Soccer '94, after he and about 200 others watched the drawn-out announcement on a large closed-circuit television.

"I got a little nervous when they said they just added Giants Stadium within the last 24 hours," said Hank Friedman, Boston Soccer intern.

Others groaned when officials mentioned the Pontiac Silverdome in Michigan, fearing that the Detroit-area site might bump Boston off the list.

But then soccer officials in New York added Boston to the list, prompting a 10-minute explosion of screaming, cheering, hugging, kissing and back-slapping. Soccer balls were tossed across the auditorium and a few people danced as a brass band drowned out the teleconference.

The nine sites came from an initial field of 26, which was narrowed to 19 last fall. Other cities to host the games, to run from June 17-July 17, 1994, include Chicago, Dallas, New York, Los Angeles, Orlando, San Francisco and Washington, D.C.

Enthusiasts and officials called Boston's inclusion a logical one.

"What we know is what the rest of the world is going to find out — Boston is an international city, a world-class city," said Boston Mayor Raymond Flynn. "The world is going to come to Boston."

And Flynn was among those looking ahead.

"It puts us in competition for the world Olympic Games," Flynn said. "It gives us the opportunities Boston has never had before."

Repeatedly calling soccer the world's most popular sport, supporters emphasized that the even will boost the area's economy through direct spending and tourism.

"I know it will mean something in excess of $90 million," Caporale said.

He and others credited the region's strong interest in soccer with helping Boston beat out other contenders.

Former New England Patriot John Smith, who now runs soccer clinics and camps, said Massachusetts is second only to southern California in the number of youth soccer players.

"We have 100,000 kids playing in Massachusetts," he said.

"We surprised the whole United States," he said. "It was the biggest gate ever for U.S. soccer."

UM history professors receive awards

• Spain cites Latin American scholar

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

Lewis Hanke, professor emeritus of history at the University of Massachusetts, recently won one of Spain's most prestigious cultural awards, the Eloy Antonio de Nebrija — V Centenario Prize.

"He is very pleased indeed to be singled out for this honor," Hanke's wife Kate said. Due to illness, Hanke could not be reached for comment.

He was selected as the winner of the award from a group of 25 individuals from around the world. Nominees for the award came from Asia, Eastern Europe, Western Europe and North America.

"The Nebrija Prize is designed to recognize the contributions of foreign scholars to the knowledge and understanding of Spain's history and culture," said Robert E. Jones, chairperson of the history department.

"Hanke's long career and numerous publications, especially his 'Spanish Struggle for Justice in the Conquest of America,' his many writings on Friar Bartolome de las Casa (Spanish missionary and historian who lived from 1474-1566), and his documentary series on the Spanish viceroys, earned him a worldwide reputation and made him a logical candidate for the award," Jones said.

"Any Latin American historian over 45 was touched by him in some way, either through his writings, as a teacher, or the direction of organizations," said Jane Rausch, a history professor who specializes in Latin America.

The Nebrija award is named after a 15th century Spanish humorist and professor, who is credited with producing the first grammar of the Spanish language.

Hanke came to UMass in 1969 after working as a director of the Hispanic Foundation of the Library of Congress, and professorships at the University of Texas, Columbia University and the University of California. He retired from the history department in 1975.

"Lewis Hanke is one of the great Latin American scholars in the world, and this award is the recognition of a lifetime of achievement as a scholar in his field," said Jones.

"His contributions were enormous, and I can't think of anyone more deserving of this award," said Rausch.

Hanke is the Haring professor emeritus of history.

• Peers honor Civil War expert Oates

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

Stephen B. Oates, a history professor at the University of Massachusetts, has been awarded the 1992 Kidger Award from the New England History Teachers' Association.

The Kidger Award is given annually in recognition of outstanding public teaching, said Robert E. Jones, chairperson of the history department and past president of the New England History Teacher's Association.

He was presented the annual award on March 12, at the Northeast Regional Conference on the Social Sciences.

Oates teaches both undergraduate and graduate courses in the Civil War Era, and in the art and literature of biography. He currently holds the title of Paul Murray Kendall Professor of biography at UMass.

He has written 13 books and numerous articles. He is best known for a series of four biographies of four men who sought solutions to slavery and racial oppression.

The four biographies are "To Purge This Land With Blood: A Biography of John Brown"; "The Fires of Jubilee: Nat Turner's Fierce Rebellion"; "With Malice Toward None: The Life of Abraham Lincoln"; and "Let the Trumpet Sound: The Life of Martin Luther King, Jr."

He is also the author of "William Faulkner: The Man and the Artist."

The University of Hartford honored Oates with its Master Teaching Award in 1985.

The Master Teaching Award is given annually to a "creative teacher who brings new ideas to the classroom and stimulates new thinking and inspires originality."

He is also the 1981 recipient of the UMass Distinguished Teachers Award.

Past recipients of the Kidger Award include Henry Steele Commager, professor emeritus of history at Amherst College; Daniel J. Boorstin, University of Chicago educator and Librarian of Congress emeritus; and Christa McAuliffe, a New Hampshire teacher and NASA's first civilian astronaut. McAuliffe died in the Space Shuttle Challenger disaster in 1986.

"Oates has spent much of his career teaching history not only to students but the general American public," said Jones.

Payroll option shot down by angry FacSen

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

The chairperson of the committee which found the University Library sorely lacking in resources said he is disgusted by a recent Faculty Senate motion that killed an employee payroll deduction option supporting the library.

There was protest from faculty members who felt the Commonwealth should be taking the responsibility for the library, not University employees, who have gone more than four years without a raise.

English Professor David Paroissen, chairperson of the Future of the Library Committee, said he felt faculty tabled the motion because they didn't want to act upon the recommendation during the Faculty Senate meeting the week before Spring Break.

"In my view, many members didn't want to confront the scale of the catastrophe of the library and don't agree that the library should be the first priority. I think it should," said Paroissen after the meeting.

Vice Chancellor of University Relations and Development Daniel Melley said employees can donate to the library through the existing payroll gift deduction form in which faculty members can make a contribution to any program they choose.

Paroissen said the payroll deduction is "one of the best kept secrets" and feels the Library Committee's recommended payroll deduction would "dramatize the library's plight."

"Members are burying their heads in the sand and they don't want to hear that the library is suffering irreparable damage at the present rate," said Paroissen.

According to a University report, due to inadequate funding the library is failing to provide critical public services, including acquisitions of new books, cutbacks in staffing and the use of antiquated equipment.

The Future of the Library Committee established last May by the Faculty Senate found the library needs an additional $1.1 million in emergency relief in fiscal year 1993 to "stave off disaster for another year."

The report also called for a $7.8 million budgetary increase which could be spread over the next three years to rebuild and recover from the continuing damage inflicted on the holdings and overall quality of the University Library system.

"I am disappointed that there wasn't a more thorough and open minded exploration of the proposal to have a voluntary pay deduction for those who choose to exercise it," Paroissen said. "A University that doesn't take the library seriously is posturing."

In other Faculty Senate business, the Botany and the Zoology department were merged into a new Biology department.

Zoology department professor and pre-medicine advisor Brian O'Connor said the move would broaden the premed curriculum and would make better doctors.

Town Meeting hopefuls try to voice UMass concerns

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Today's townwide elections offer an important opportunity for University of Massachusetts students to gain a voice in town politics, according to several University students seeking election to Amherst Town Meeting.

Representatives vote on different issues such as town budgets, tax overrides and keg and noise bylaws during the town meeting, said Jen Wood, a junior who has served one year in town meeting.

"The Amherst Town Meeting is the main government body and is also the root of the town," said Wood, who is running for a one- year term as representative of Precinct 5.

Wood said it is important for students to be represented in the 246-member Amherst Town Meeting so they can convey the opinions of the student population.

"Students need to have a voice in the town meeting because some of the issues that are voted on affect the students too," said Wood, who is Student Government Association president.

Sophomore Jon Aronson, who is running for a three-year term as representative of Precinct 3, said he believes Amherst looks down on students.

"The more students who are involved in Town Meeting the better because the students will have a bigger voice against the town," Aronson said.

Sophomore Dave Anderson, who is vying for a three-year seat among a large field of candidates, said he feels students are treated as third class citizens by Amherst lenging, but not beyond his knowledge. He worked in Boston over the summer and during this winter break.

"The engineering I was expected to do was relatively simple," said Graham.

How can students get involved? All you need to do is to attend a planning session offered almost daily at room 16 in the Curry Hicks Building.

This week sessions are also offered Wednesday and next Monday at 12:20 p.m., Thursday at 1 p.m., and Friday at 1:25 p.m. A schedule is available at the office. These sessions will give more information about the process of getting a co-op or internship.

In addition to getting work experience, Mather helps students learn valuable skills such as interviewing.

"Many students walk out of an interview thinking that they did great when in fact the employer feels the student has blown it," said Silver.

Mather will be providing an interviewing workshop this Wednesday at Campus Center Room 917 at 12:20. This workshop will focus on how to emphasize strengths and weaknesses in an interview.

According to Silver, many students get discouraged because they can not find a job right away through the center. Students should continue to check up at the main office every week or every few days.

The main office is in Fraternity/Sorority Park and can be reached by taking the Orchard Hill bus.

State has mixed record on children, report says

BOSTON (AP) — Massachusetts is ranked seventh in the nation for overall child welfare and first at preventing child deaths, according to a report released Monday.

However, the report said Massachusetts also has growing numbers of high school dropouts, teen-age parents, single parent families and children living in poverty.

The "Kids Count" report, in which all 50 states were ranked, as released Thursday in Washington by the Center for the Study of Social Policy and Annie E. Casey Foundation.

"What it's saying is that children are worse off than they were 10 years ago, and worse off all over the country," said Mark Friedman, a center spokesman.

Overall, most Northeast states ranked higher than other parts of the country. However, every state shows deterioration in a least two areas, Friedman said.

For the Bay State, "the report shows that there are significant problems with poverty, single parents and teen parents, and it seems to be getting worse," he said.

Massachusetts had the lowest rates of death among children aged 1 to 14, recording 22.3 per 100,000, the report said.

That's an improvement from 1980, when the state's infant mortality rate wan 10.5 per 1,000 live births.

But in the recent report, Massachusetts ranked 27th in school dropout rates, with 72 percent of students being graduated from high school and 33rd for children living in single-parent homes — nearly 25 percent.

The percentage of low-weight babies declined from 6.1 percent in 1980 to 5.9 percent.

Nationally, the report said 12.7 million children in the United States, or one in five, were poor in 1990. That's an increase of 2.7 million children, or 22 percent, since 1979.

Nearly 15 percent of Massachusetts children live in poverty, the report said, an increase of about one percentage point since 1979.

"Many of these things signal to me that the United States is not providing for its future," said Winifred Breines, a sociology professor at Northeastern University.

"Infant mortality was high in Massachusetts so to see it decline is good, but because it was so high, a drop really doesn't mean that much," she said.

James Alan Fox, dean of Northeastern's College of Criminal Justice, said the statistics for violent teen-age deaths are misleading because they reflect a drop of just two deaths from 1984 figures.

"I don't want to be a killjoy, but I don't thing there's anything to celebrate. There's a 10 percent drop, but we're only talking two kids," he said.

"We're generally low in homicide anyway in Massachusetts. But violence among teen-agers has been increasing in recent years, so these numbers [showing fewer violent death for teens] surprise me," Fox said.

• Two Cashin female residents reported Sunday an attempted forced entry by an unknown suspect. The door to the room was smashed, apparently by a hammer. Damage was estimated at $400.

• A video game in the Campus Center game room was vandalized Friday. There is no estimate available on the damage to the machine and it is not known if any money was stolen.

• A new Macintosh computer was reported stolen from the Goessmann Laboratory Saturday. There were no signs of forced entry and the door was reportedly locked earlier. The computer's value is $3,000.

Chase regulations need toughening, families say

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Families of people killed during high-speed police chases urged a legislative committee on Monday to require municipalities to adopt uniform standards on pursuits.

The families also asked for tougher penalties for those who flee from the police.

Most of the dead family members weren't involved in the chases. Many of the victims were struck by the car being chased by police.

Registry Police Officer Maria Torres, who is stationed in Springfield, lost her mother six months ago when a person being chased by Holyoke police struck her sister's car. Her sister was injured critically.

"It's hard for me. I've been a police officer for 16 years and I love my job," Torres told the Legislature's Criminal Justice Committee.

She and other family members, accompanied by attorney Alan Goodman of Springfield, pressed the Legislature to increase penalties for those who fail to stop, require departments to have written policies, increase police training and have better reporting of cases.

"I'm not mad at the police officer. I am a police officer. I know what they were going through at the time of the chase," she said.

Torres also made it clear that she and the others weren't seeking a ban on high-speed chases. And she said the chase that killed her mother could have been justified because of an outstanding warrant and the previous record of the person being chased.

"I don't want to handcuff the police because I am the one who would be handcuffed," she said. Torres said her department already has a pursuit policy in place.

Mark Petrakis of Somers, Conn., said his sister was killed and his father and brother-in-law seriously injured when their car was hit by a vehicle being pursued by Springfield police on Dec. 27, 1991.

Petrakis said the car was stolen, but the people in it were teenagers and had not been involved in any violent crimes.

Sen. James A. Jajuga (D-Methuen), a retired state police lieutenant, was disturbed by chases where the police officer knew the driver of the car and where the chase was started because of a relatively minor motor vehicle charge.

You must vote 'yes' on Question 2

I will never forget the day last month when I walked out of the Amherst Post Office and I was confronted with another petition. It sparked my interest and I continued to speak with the petitioner from the Pioneer Valley Pro-Democracy Campaign for a while. The petition was to get a question about equal public financing of elections and free and equal access to the media on the ballot. Well, it is on the ballot now as Question 2 and it got there through the support of many Amherst voters.

Equal public financing of elections sounds expensive, I know. You are probably thinking of how difficult it is to pay for school and are saying "Forget those power-hungry wealthy candidates. Let them fend for themselves!" Listen, this is how it would work. Each candidate would have to acquire a certain number of signatures along with $5 individual contributions to become an eligible candidate. This public support would eliminate the need for candidates to accept large contributions from PACs and wealthy individuals. Candidates would be supported by the people and would finally represent the people, not those who can afford to buy the candidates.

Question 2 also is concerned with eligible candidates receiving free and equal media access. This would eliminate a large portion of a candidate's budget and make campaigning less expensive. Also, it would give the people equal opportunities to be informed about each candidate.

Citizen-financed elections and free and equal access to the media are concerns on Question 2 of the March 24 ballot. Voting yes on Question 2 would make Congress accountable to voters instead of wealthy campaign contributors. Voting yes on Question 2 would allow eligible candidates to compete fairly in public elections and would allow citizens who are qualified to run for public offices, regardless of their economic status. Voting yes on Question 2 would eliminate scandals, such as, the S and L crisis and the Keating Five scandal and would save taxpayers a lot of money in the long run. Voting yes on Question 2 meaning voting in favor of Congress working for the people.

Introducing: Logic Police

This fall, the philosophy department will be offering a new course titled Introductory Administrative Logic (PHIL 199A). The lectures will be held at Whitmore, week days from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. The decision to implement this mandatory course was voted on by the Logic Police late last night in a closed meeting, as a result of many incidences of clearly illogical planning and/or action taken by the University over the past few years. The following document cites two representative cases which the chairman of the LP, Veronica Lane, presented in her argument for instituting the aforementioned credit course.

Bob Silverstein

The Mullins Memorial Center: Everyone will agree that it is rather absurd that a New England school hosting some 20,000 students is not currently fielding a hockey team, not to mention the fact that possessing one of the top college basketball teams in the nation, a larger sporting arena is desperately needed to accommodate the fans. Several years ago, the idea of building the arena seemed quite wonderful. The impression was that it was being funded totally from private contributors and that the money was already committed, which quieted many complaints about use of state resources during the recession. Now that the project is nearly complete, the administration informs the students that the private contributors they were talking about were actually future students in the form of a $100 per semester fee for the next 30 years to be tacked onto the already balloon inflated tuition bill (call it "Authority Fee," call it "Curriculum Fee," call it whatever you want — if everyone has to pay it, it's all the same thing: TUITION). To top it all off, the University is now whining that they won't have the resources to operate the multimillion dollar all-purpose facility. Do you call that logic?

Lot 31 and 26 Parking Arrangement: The most sought-after parking lot on the north side of campus is the predominantly faculty-occupied Lot 31. This was also the most convenient parking location for many engineering, mathematics and physical science employees, being situated close to the LGRT, Goessmann and many other buildings. This seemed good enough — but not for the good old U. of M. administration. They said, "Hey, how about we take all of the trailer homes and Port-O-Potties from the construction company building the Silvio O. Conte Memorial Polymer Research Center and stick them all in Upper Lot 31?" Of course, everyone at that particular meeting thought it was a great idea. So all of the people who paid the outrageous fee for close proximity parking got blasted down the hill to Lower 31 (i.e. the Parking Office lot, where people park illegally all day long) and to Lot 26. And that is where the other interesting building expedition has meddled things. The oh-so-necessary Polymer Science Chiller Facility now resides in what used to be the best spaces in Lot 26. I understand that Polymer Science is a blooming field at the University, but do they have to expand their horizons at the expense of our valuable and scarce parking real estate? In a pseudo-sympathetic move, the University decided to add an entirely new, closer to campus, section of Lot 26 to make amends for the Chiller incident. Fair enough. But at another late night meeting, they recently decided to change the new lot's designation from 26 to 31, which essentially means that now that new lot sits empty all day because nobody with a Lot 31 sticker knows they can park down there, and everybody with a Lot 26 validation sticker will get a ticket for parking on lands which are rightfully theirs to claim.

In an interview with Ms. Lane following the Logic Police proceedings, correspondent Blake O'Connell returned with the following enlightening account:

Blake: Ms. Lane —
Lane: Call me Veronica.
Blake: Okay. Veronica, with all the hype over the Logic Police and their work in exposing inefficiencies in the administration, what statement would you like to make to the public regarding the. . .
Lane: (Interrupts) Say, are those Bugle Boy jeans you're wearing?
Blake: Why, yes!
Lane: Thank you. No further questions.

Don't believe 'shrinking pie' myth if you believe in education

Something like 1,500 to 2,000 UMass students have been forced to quit school, over the last few years, due to increased costs. Right now, they're pumping gas or working in convenience stores. The rest of us have just been stuck with a 4 percent increase passed by a dubious vote of the Board of Trustees. When next September comes, there'll be at least another few hundred of us missing. Something is going wrong. What is it?

Gov. William Weld could tell you. He'd tell you about a shrinking pie, and about how we've all got to sacrifice until this recession is over. You'd get the same story from the Board of Trustees and the Board of Regents, many of whom also sit on a corporate board or two. But before you believe them, you should know something most of them have in common: five figure incomes. Well, that's not quite accurate. Actually, some of them have six figure incomes. The point is that when they approve an increase of $1,000 for students at UMass, it looks to them like small change.

So, maybe if we sat them down and told them sincerely how hard it is for us to pay tuition and increases, and that most of us are mortgaging the next 10 years of our lives to pay their increases, then maybe they would stop, and even, yes, lower our tuition!

NOT. You see, they know who would have to pay for UMass if we didn't. They would have to pay for it. Middle and lower income people in Massachusetts are taxed out. The only ones with any dough left are the rich. If UMass and other public necessities are to be funded, the revenues would have to come from them. But perhaps they would tell us that they are feeling the pinch just as sharply as the rest of us.

That brings us back to this shrinking pie baloney. The fact is that the total national income, over the last decade or so, has risen quite a bit. The phenomenon of the "shrinking pie" has a very simple explanation that has been made explicit in at least a thousand economic studies. One recent study, however, instead of being swept under the rug, was published on the front page of the New York Times. And even Dan Rather, despite his million a year salary, covered the study in detail. This is an indication of just how obvious the situation has become.

Zack Exley

This study showed that though total national income rose substantially, 60 percent of that gain was received by the small number of families that make up the top 1 percent of income earners. The top 20 percent of income earners, including that one percent, received 94 percent of the total gain! That left only 6 percent for the other 80 percent of the population. Equally incredible, during that period, taxes on the richest 1 percent were cut substantially. Taxes on the middle and low income people, on the other hand, were raised. This is what Weld and our not-so-trustworthy trustees would call a shrinking pie. The facts show, however, that it's not the pie that's shrinking, but just our slice.

The rich and the corporations have chosen, through the policies of a government that represents them, to increase their lot at the expense of the rest of us. The American wage has been slashed, job security has been eliminated, all public programs, regardless of efficiency or worth, have been miniaturized. This has been the strategy chosen by corporate America to keep up profits in an increasingly competitive global economy. Supposedly it has been part of a thought-out economic plan called "trickle down," which was going to pull us out of hard times. Well, it's been 12 years and things have only gotten worse. But if they want to keep on trying, and if we're going to be duped into letting them, then at least they've got to be good citizens about it.

That's right, if we've got to sacrifice, and mortgage three more years of our future in loans to pay their increases, then they should sacrifice something, too. Let's see, the average income of the top 1 percent is about $550,000 per year. Can't they just give up 1 or 2 percent of that for the salvation of their own country? Think of the sacrifices Americans are making all across the country! Nearly everyone is working extra hours or second jobs, and still having to make ends meet with less. Why can't those top 1 percent, who have so far only profited from the sacrifices of their fellow citizens, give some back? For them it would just mean waiting another year to buy that yacht, but for us, it would mean a real change. A 3 percent increase on the taxes for the richest would enable the country to rebuild its infrastructure, to finance the rejuvenation of the economy and IT WOULD FUND PUBLIC EDUCATION, which is probably the most precious economic resource on which the wealthy depend. And their 3 percent would still be a smaller increase than our 4 percent, so as far as we're concerned, they'd have nothing to complain about.

Remember, we were supposed to have gotten over all of this class stuff back in 1776. Eliminating public higher education is a big step toward creating a rigid class society in which only the children of the rich have a chance. Raising class issues like I have done here is often dismissed as "the politics of greed." Well, hopefully no one in this society believes in greed. I don't think many do. And that's why I'm sure Weld and his cohorts will understand when they're asked to make a small patriotic sacrifice in support of UMass and a classless society, by chipping in for a change, and giving us poor folk a break.

even though the town is mostly made up of students.

"Students should be treated as equal members of Amherst because students pay to live in this town too," Anderson said.

Anderson said students should get involved in town meeting by voting in the town elections or running for positions themselves. "Students have to show the town that we are not people that are here one day and gone the next, but that we care about the issues that affect Amherst," said Anderson.

In Precincts 1, 4 and 10 there are 12 open, uncontested spots which will be filled today by write-in votes.

Sylvan and Northeast residents should vote at the Lutheran Church. Southwest residents vote at the Bangs Community Center. Except for Van Meter, Central residents vote at the Wildwood School. Orchard Hill residents vote at the North Fire Station on North Pleasant Street. The polls will be open until 8 p.m.

See Sweeney Todd!

By SHAWN MCDONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

A gentleman sits down in a fancy leather chair, and gives his instructions to the barber — "A bit off the top, please." The barber nods curtly at his customer, then slashes his throat open with a razor. The body is disposed of through a hidden trap, to be recovered — and used — later.

Perhaps this sounds like a scene from a slasher flick, or even an item on the news — yet the actual origin is much stranger.

It's a scene from a Broadway musical.

The show is composer Stephen Sondheim's "Sweeney Todd," which revolutionized the musical theater just over a decade ago — chasing away the toe-tapping ghosts of Broadway past. Now, a dozen years and two successful Broadway runs later, this groundbreaking musical is coming to UMass.

The original saga of Todd is somewhat older than its singing cousin, dating back to Victorian penny-dreadfuls — which told the story of a murderous barber, who slaughtered his Fleet Street patrons as an act of revenge against the society which separated him from his wife and infant daughter. There is plenty of blood in Sweeney's tale, along with lust, insanity and several helpings of cannibalism.

As adapted by Sondheim and dramatist Hugh Wheeler, the story is no less unsavory — but they have added moral shadings which transform the Demon Barber from a violent abstraction into a more sympathetic victim of chance. This is in no way softening Todd's edge — rather, it serves to make the story all the more engrossing... and upsetting.

The play's human connections are the things which director Daniel Miller hopes to explore in his new production of Todd, which opens Wednesday at Bowker Auditorium. As in the recent fascination with Hannibal Lecter ("Silence of the Lambs"), Todd will appeal first as a vision of evil — and only then will his humanity begin to take over.

The audience will not only thrill at the play's Grand Guignol effects, but also grieve at its sorrowful conclusion.

"You don't placate a crowd, anymore," he explained. "No one wants to see a 'happily ever after.'" Indeed, while old-school song-and-dance shows like "The Will Rogers Follies" are flounderin on Broadway, the musicals of the Todd revolution are flourishing.

True, the murders, suicides or sheer depictions of misery which populate shows like "Sweeney Todd," "Miss Saigon," "Les Miserables," may be disturbing — yet they are reflective of a reality more familiar to most audiences than that of the tycoons, Broadway producers or good-hearted chorus girls which filled the musicals of yesterday.

Todd's Victorian society is in many ways the same as our own — there is the same outward piety, the same customs and mores and thus the same hypocrisy. When Sweeney transgresses the unwritten laws of societal interaction, it is shocking not because his morality is skewed, but because he seems to possess some. Unlike the play's corruptible gentry, Sweeney Todd has a sort of nobility, even as a murderer, which seems unquestionable. It is a scathing indictment of human nature — made an affecting one by virtue of the fact that everyone can see a little of Sweeney in themselves.

"Sweeney Todd" will be performed at Bowker Auditorium on March 25-28, at 8 p.m. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, $6 general public, $4 for students, children and

Weld seeks trade opening in Europe

By KEVIN COSTELLOE
Associated Press

BERLIN — Gov. William Weld opened a Massachusetts international trade office here Monday, the first such outpost established by a U.S. state in the German capital.

The office will help American companies get started in Germany, Eastern Europe and the republics of the former Soviet Union, according to the governor.

Weld said he had discussed the plans with about six or seven other governors, who all said they believe it's a good idea.

"We are the first, but we may see six or a dozen more offices similar to this in the next few years, in my opinion," Weld told a news conference.

"We had the choice of being the first in Berlin or the 35th in Brussels," Weld said, referring to the headquarters of the European Community. "We chose to be the first in Berlin. So, we're hoping to get in on the ground floor."

The governor said in his opening remarks the office "enhances our presence in Western Europe."

Weld, making the initial presentation in German, also made it clear the state's companies will be seeking a role in Eastern Europe as well.

"Simply put, having a trade office in Berlin is going to help Massachusetts firms capitalize on opportunities in the European Community while also assisting in the cleanup and rebuilding of Eastern Europe," Weld said.

The two-room office is located in the Moabit section near the center of Berlin, and is headed by Brita Lambert, the former assistant manager of the American Chamber of Commerce in Germany.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Straying too far from familiar activities could prove unnerving today. Stick to your normal routine. Reassess a relationship that has become too close for comfort.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Once you know what you want, go after it. You have the vision that many people lack. Trust your first impressions when it comes to love or money. Refuse to be manipulated.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Keep your feet on the ground in an affair of the heart. Although you can mix love and work at times, doing so is always risky. Secret deals and bullying tactics are taboo.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You could find yourself right in the middle of a family confrontation where just about anything goes. Count to 10 before expressing a personal opinion.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Guard your physical and emotional well-being today. Roll with the punches to come out swinging. A feeling of loneliness may overtake you since your dog misses you (aw, how sweet). Getting involved will banish the blues.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): If you seem unusually quiet, it is because you are sorting out your thoughts. Try to decide the best way to proceed with a pet project. Financial rewards come from an unexpected quarter.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Exercise special restraint in financial matters to avoid mishaps. This is not a good time to seek favors; rely on your own efforts. A candid chat sets you at ease tonight.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Faulty advice and half-baked communications are possible now. Keep important matters in your own hands, particularly where money is concerned. Become a decision-maker who knows the score.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Impulsive spending could cause regrets. Return a purchase you do not really need. Channeling nervous energy into work tasks could help you find that elusive pot of gold.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Joining forces with a shrewd business associate could mean new prosperity. Share expenses to save money. Seeing the world through the eyes of a child changes your perspective.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Those who are in the limelight always risk drawing unwanted attention. No matter where you are, be discreet. Recycle an old project or idea to make new profits.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Focus on contacting people who have power and wealth today. You can reap big dividends in the form of praise or money. The tides of change begin to benefit you in a tangible way.

UMass baseball returns from a 2-6 Florida trip

By CHRIS CUDDY and
MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team completed its annual Florida trip last Saturday with a 2-6 record, but UMass coach Mike Stone felt the game experience was very beneficial for his team.

"The philosophy for going down there is to play against good competition and maybe sneak in a win or two here and there," Stone said. "I think we did all right."

Recapping the games:

Florida 12, Massachusetts 1

Converted reliever Ron Villone made his 1992 debut for UMass, giving up 5 runs in three innings as the Minutemen fell at the hands of the nationally ranked Florida Gators. Senior captain John Carelli accounted for half the Minutemen's hits, going 3-for-4 at the plate, while driving in the team's lone run.

"After the game, I told the Florida coach I'd like to play him in two months," Stone said. "The southern teams have a definite advantage, because they already have twenty games under their belts."

Troy State 15, Massachusetts 8

Troy State lit up the Minutemen pitching staff for 15 runs on 16 hits, including three home runs, as UMass dropped to 0-2 on the year. Bright spots included the improved Minutemen offense, which scraped out 11 hits with Shaun Berryman, Carelli and newcomer Jeff January accounting for 6 of them. Berryman and junior shortstop Steve Corradi drove in four of the team's eight runs.

"We couldn't get anyone out," Stone said. "I was a little disappointed with our pitching."

Central Florida 8, Massachusetts 5

The early season losses continued to pile up for the Minutemen, as Central Florida held off a late inning UMass rally while upping their record to 19-5. The Minutemen saw their offense scratch out only five hits, as Scott Meaney suffered a loss in his season debut to a powerful Central Florida squad.

Stetson 9, Massachusetts 3

The Minutemen's offensive woes continued as they managed only 4 hits, while Stetson pounded UMass starter Rich Graham for eight runs in the first two innings. Graham pitched 7 innings, with junior righty Jeff Toothaker coming out of the bullpen and pitching a perfect eighth, as the Minutemen fell to 0-4 on their southern swing.

Massachusetts 2, Central Florida 1

It was rematch time for the Minutemen, and junior lefthander Ron Villone responded, pitching a complete game two-hitter while striking out 17 as UMass notched their first win of the 92' campaign. Villone had a no hitter through 7 2/3 innings, while freshmen Greg LaRocca pounded a two-out two-strike single in the sixth for the winner.

"That was a big win for us," Stone said. "Central Florida's a real good team and it gave us some confidence."

Cornell 10, Massachusetts 5

Jim Telgheder was pounded for the second straight start, and the Minutemen defense committed three errors in a game that Coach Stone described as "ugly."

"We hit a lot of balls hard, but we hit them right at them," Stone said. "We gave up a lot of runs."

South Florida 13, Massachusetts 3
Massachusetts 9, South Florida 7

The Minutemen split a trip-ending series with South Florida, getting crushed last Friday night on a game that was televised by Sportschannel New England. The Minutemen then exerted enough effort Saturday to squeak by South Florida. Stone said, "I'm pleased winning the last game against a high caliber team like South Florida."

While the Florida trip wasn't a great success in terms of victories, the players got a chance to play outdoors for the first time this spring.

Stone said that the first four games were basically tryouts and that the team responded well during the end of the trip.

"We were a little unsettled at first," Stone said. "We have a lot of people that are very close to each other in terms of talent. There isn't a big difference at some positions."

McGeeney (20 saves) to tie the match at 3.

In the second, Loyola added another extra-man goal courtesy of midfielder Gary Miller. Fellow middies Gene Ubriaco and Kevin Anderson added scores to finish the second half at 6-3. UMass had their chances and moved the ball well in the Loyola zone, but McGeeney came up with big saves, particulary a robbery of a Depp shot from close range early in the period.

Though penalties were a big part of Loyola's win — they went 4-for-11 on the man-up as opposed to UMass' 1-for-7 performance — coach Rick Kottle wasn't impressed with his team's power play.

"We had trouble with [extra-man] all week in practice and that carried over to today," he said. "We need to execute."

Much of Loyola's problems on extra man, however, were a result of the Gorilla defense. Though the 'Hounds moved the ball well, UMass' checking was equal to the task.

"Our man-down defense sucked it up and stayed tough all game," Garber said.

Kline added two goals in the fourth, joining Millon and Edell for UMass scoring honors with three points apiece. Rob Falvey and John Schlipf rounded out the scoring for the Gorillas.

Face-off specialist Kevin O'Connor hurt his ankle in the first and missed most of the game. His replacement, Sam Joseph, preformed admirably and won half of the face-offs he took.

was like, who is that? People were saying that's Jim [McCoy]. I knew him as Jim. I didn't know that that was Jim McCoy.

"Then one day I saw a picture of him in the newspaper and it had his name under it. Then I was like, 'Oh. That's Jim McCoy.' After a tryout for an MVP Tournament, he gave me a ride home. And ever since, we've been the best of friends."

While Herndon will certainly be remembered for his spectacular dunks, his long shorts, which often times sag well-below his knees, have become a trademark.

"One day, I was watching old NCAA tapes that come on ESPN and they showed everyone with real, real tight shorts," he said. "Playing with small shorts isn't comfortable. I figured if I had longer shorts, with a wider leg area, that gives me more room to get out and run and jump the way I do."

Asked if he worried about them one day falling down, Herndon said, "No. I pull the strings real tight."

Herndon's shorts may not be the longest in the country. In fact, there is a player in the Atlantic 10 who wears his shorts as low if not lower. James Hargrove of Duquesne showed up at the A-10 tourney this year with a knee brace that coupled with his shorts covered his entire leg.

"When we went to play Duquesne," Herndon said. "I told him to get me a pair."

The next UMass loss will be Herndon's last in a UMass uniform... even if it is too long.

In short(s), there's more to Herndon

University of Massachusetts senior forward Will Herndon has gone from jumping over cars in Pittsburgh to dunking over defenders in the NCAA Tournament.

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Thinking about the University of Massachusetts basketball team without Will Herndon is hard to do. It's kind of like wondering what Linus would be like without his blanket.

Who would take Anton Brown's lobs and jam them through the rim, bring the fans to their feet, grab improbable rebounds, do all the little things that number 34 does?

The answer: Well, we don't need one. Not just yet anyhow, because the senior from Pittsburgh has at least one game left, this Thursday (7:40 p.m.) against Kentucky in the NCAA Tournament.

While Herndon says he's confident the Minutemen can hold their own against the Wildcats, a part of him is just happy to be here.

Back in October, the 6-3 forward faced a much greater challenge than any he faces on the court. He had to convince a five-man committee to give him back a year of eligibility, which he lost because he transferred from the University of Richmond in the middle of his first season, rather than after the year.

In short, the NCAA has a rule which states any player who transfers must sit out one year. On top of that, the National Letter of Intent has a rule which mandates that any player who transfers before the completion of his first full season, must sit an additional year.

But all that is behind Herndon now.

"The committee could just as easily have told me, 'well, you didn't present your argument well enough, therefore you don't get your eligibility back,'" Herndon said.

His argument was that he was not informed of the rule by Richmond until after he had already transferred, something he obviously managed to convince the committee of.

"It was nerve-racking, not knowing what those people were thinking," Herndon says. "We were wondering if we made a good enough claim. But those final 10 or 15 minutes before the phone call came, that was when we were under the most pressure. Because that was when we started having doubts."

Herndon says he does not harbor any ill-feelings toward Richmond. However, don't believe that for one minute. Herndon would have liked nothing more than an opportunity to play against the Spiders.

"I would have given my left foot just to be out there and play against them," he says. "Me, Coach [John] Calipari and Bruiser [Flint] joke about that. The coaches were saying if we did draw them in the NCAA Tournament, the one guy they wouldn't have to sub for is me.

"I'm just happy I have been able to do my part and get the team to the Sweet 16," he said.

What Herndon gives to the Minutemen is perhaps more valuable than any other player on the team. He is the off-guard when the team breaks the press, a power-forward/point-forward in the half court offense. He is the guy who causes the most difficult matchup problems for the opponent. He guards centers, forwards and guards, no matter how big or how small, how quick or how slow. Herndon guards them all and out-jumps them all too.

One reporter went so far as to vote for Herndon as Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, arguing that he could not understand how UMass forward Harper Williams won the award since Herndon is the team's MVP. However, in what amounts to an award given to the player with the best stats on a good team, Herndon (10.3 points, 6.0 rebounds per game) just didn't have the numbers to compete with either Williams or Jim McCoy.

"I'm honored that people think I'm the most valuable player," Herndon said. "But like I said, every player on the team is valuable."

One of the little things Herndon adds to the Minutemen is his awesome leaping ability. How nice was it to know that in Sunday's 77-71 UMass win against Syracuse, the Minutemen would get the first chance to score in the extra session because the Orangemen simply had no one who could sky as high for the jump ball?

"I never really thought about my jumping ability until this year when reporters started telling me about it," Herndon said.

One summer day in Pittsburgh, back when Herndon was a freshman in high school, he was hanging around on the playground with a bunch of guys and they were arguing about who could jump higher. It came down to Herndon and another kid, who Herndon describes as a "rival."

"People were saying he could jump over this many people and my friends were saying I could jump over this many people. So one of my friends was like, 'well Hern can jump over a car.'

"I looked at him along with everybody else. . . So a friend of mine had a little Escort and he drove it out on to the court. I went back about a court-and-a-half, took a running start, with no dribbles and jumped over the hood. I didn't jump over the whole car, just the hood. After that, they said I was the best dunker in the City of Pittsburgh. So far all the dunk contests we've had in the summer, I've won them all."

The other Pittsburgh native, who plays for UMass is McCoy. No, he wasn't there to see Herndon jump over the car, but McCoy has witnessed enough Herndon jams to last a lifetime.

"I didn't know Jim back then," Herndon said. "My remembrance of first seeing Jim was at a basketball tryout. He had his socks pulled all the way up to his knees and he had real big knee braces. When I first saw him, I

Loyola hands Gorillas opening-game loss

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

BALTIMORE — The University of Massachusetts lacrosse team, playing its season opener on the same field where the 1991 season ended, held its own against 4th-ranked and unbeaten Loyola College for nearly three quarters before finally succumbing, 17-10, Saturday afternoon at Loyola's Curley Field.

"We went out and competed on their level," said UMass coach Ted Garber, who said he was satisfied with the way UMass opened the 1992 campaign. "We had better effort and better intensity than they did, though we've got to polish up our execution."

The Gorillas (0-1, ranked 17th) were within striking distance at 8-6 in the third after Mark Millon and Billy Edell scored unassisted. But the Greyhounds, now 4-0 and ranked No. 2 due to a 7-6 upset of No. 1 North Carolina last week, reeled off five straight scores to effectively put the game out of reach at 13-6. UMass was never closer than five goals again.

"Their real strength came at us," Garber said of Loyola's five-goal run. "They got up field quickly and created unsettled situations."

For two and a half quarters, however, the Gorillas made Loyola squirm. While UMass exhibited the inexperience you'd expect from a team playing its first real game of the year, they also played airtight defense, particularly in man-down situations and on Loyola's go-to players, attackers Jim Blanding and Kevin Beach.

"We covered two first team All-Americans and basically, they got nothing," Garber said. "They were averaging nine points a game."

Senior midfielder-defender Mario Lopez, in his first game back from a serious knee injury suffered last year, held Blanding to three goals. Beach had a stronger effort, finishing with a goal and four assists in a game-high, five-point performance for the Greyhounds.

Gorilla goalie Rip Correnti made an impressive debut, saving 14 shots in three quarters of work. He made several point-blank stops on Loyola's extra-man opportunities. Tom LoPresti added two saves.

UMass' mistakes, however, eventually caught up with them. Three substitution fouls cost UMass some promising opportunities, and Loyola converted missed assignments and bad penalties directly into goals when it counted.

But until Loyola made their run in the third, every time the Gorillas dug themselves a hole they climbed right back out by cashing in with an effective ball-control offense.

It looked as if the teams were bent on repeating last season's 20-9 Loyola NCAA quarterfinal victory in the early going. Blanding opened the scoring unassisted, followed less than a minute later by Kevin Jedlicka. Another minute later, in a man-up situation, Beach cranked a one-hopper off Curley Field's artificial turf to make the score 3-0.

Garber then called his second timeout of the first quarter, strolled out to midfield to chew out the referees for some dubious officiating, and settled his team down.

The strategy paid off. After Mike Cain capitalized unassisted on a UMass power play, Mark Millon went to work. He fed a perfect centering pass from behind the cage to a cutting Wes Depp, who scored without breaking stride to cut the lead to 1. Twenty seconds later, Millon took a feed from Greg Kline and shot past Loyola goalie Tim

Analyzing Baltimore and its new facility

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

First things first: although the premise of this road trip was to cover a lacrosse match, any piece about sports in Baltimore has to begin with a discussion of the Orioles' new facility, Oriole Park at Camden Yards, which dominates the skyline next to the hotel where the University of Massachusetts lacrosse team stayed.

To put it bluntly, the place is drop-dead beautiful. It's Fenway Park with 20,000 more seats. Everything about it, from the manner in which it was incorporated into the surrounding neighborhood to the 'Orioles' painted on the gates, is done with attention to detail and tradition in mind.

The Gorillas weren't the only lacrosse team staying at the Harbor Mariott. The Syracuse Orangemen, along with their usual throng of boosters, checked in Friday night for a Saturday game against Johns Hopkins.

Maybe the Harbor Mariott was unlucky. Like UMass, the Orange could not escape from Baltimore with a victory. Hopkins prevailed and secured themselves the No. 1 ranking in the nation in this week's U.S. Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association poll. SU dropped to third behind Loyola, while UMass fell to No. 17.

A couple observations about Syracuse: first of all, its fans follow the Orange like Jerry's Kids follow the Grateful Dead. The hotel lobby, restaurant and swimming pool were full of SU boosters and fans. Considering the magnitude of its match with Hopkins — had it won, Syracuse would have reclaimed the top spot — it wasn't such a surprise.

Second, UMass' players were much more proficient on the lobby grand piano. While some of the more musical Gorillas on the roster were cranking out "Piano Man" and other hits, the best SU could muster was the theme from "The Exorcist."

Freshman goalie Tom LoPresti surprised everyone in the house when he took the ball all the way to the Loyola zone before passing off. Had he gotten 10 or 20 feet further he could have shot the ball — certainly not an everyday sight for a goalie.

"I saw the opening and just took it," LoPresti said.

Loyola coach Rich Kottle was exceptionally critical of his team's performance Saturday. It certainly didn't look like the No. 2 team in the nation, even if it did beat North Carolina.

But after unleashing such comments as "we've got to stop watching the scoreboard," "we were up 3-0 and we weren't doing it the right way" and "we matched [UMass] error for error," Kottle summed up with this gem: "Put in at the end we're glad we won."

Chill on the Hill: If you haven't noticed, the future Dick Garber Field is covered with snow. That won't, however, postpone Saturday's home opener with St. John's unless, as coach Ted Garber deadpanned, "there's a nuclear blast or a blizzard." The weather isn't keeping the Gorillas inside, either, as the team practiced outside in the snow yesterday.

Brown upsets Clinton in Connecticut

By LISA MARIE PANE
Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. — Challenger Jerry Brown scored a startling upset over Bill Clinton in the Connecticut presidential primary Tuesday night to slow the front-runner's march toward the Democratic nomination.

President Bush swept easily to Republican victory with two-thirds of the vote over dormant rival Patrick Buchanan and the nagging protest vote.

The Democratic verdict, 38 percent and a 3-point victory for Brown, was a surprise stall in the Clinton campaign despite the Arkansas governor's claim that he expected it to be a tight contest.

The Connecticut upset instantly raised the stakes in the New York primary, the next major contest, two weeks away. Clinton can't afford more trouble there.

Brown said he'd won Connecticut because "people want change, I'm a vehicle for that. . ."

"This thing is now coming to New York and this will be the battle of where the party's going," Brown said in Brooklyn, N.Y. He said he'd been doubted, ignored and ridiculed for his anti-establishment campaign.

Brown said he would "keep this campaign moving all the way back to the convention."

Clinton still holds a commanding delegate lead of more than 7 to 1 over Brown. He and Brown were each winning 21 delegates in Connecticut, under an apportionment system based on congressional district vote shares.

Democratic National Chairman Ronald Brown said Clinton is still on track toward the nomination. "It's not over til it's over, but I don't see anything in the results today that dislodges Bill Clinton from what appears to be a patch toward the nomination," Brown said.

Clinton, in West Orange, N.J., said before the polls closed that "people don't want the process to be over."

"They sure don't want it to be taken from them and I don't either," he said. "I've always expected it to go through to New Jersey and California" on June 2.

Clinton's remarks put the best face on the unexpected outcome, but the mission of any presidential campaign is to foreclose the process by winning it as swiftly as possible.

Brown, asked whether he had slowed Clinton's momentum, said, "The people have slowed it down."

Paul Tsongas, his closest rival, quit the race last Thursday, saying he couldn't afford to continue.

Brown was the sole alternative to Clinton, although Tsongas' supporters did not drop their effort to round up votes for the former Massachusetts senator.

With 94 percent of the precincts counted in the Democratic primary, it was:
Brown 60,455 or 38 percent.
Clinton 56,473 or 35 percent.
Tsongas 31,870 or 20 percent.

Schools study policies on harassment

By CHRIS TORCHIA
Associated Press

BOSTON — Colleges and universities, struggling against a tide of sexual harassment on campus, are revamping old prevention policies and experimenting with new ones.

At the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, for example, students can choose from surveys, booklets, workshops, training sessions and a host of other programs addressing sexual harassment.

Other universities are cleaning out loopholes in their policies forbidding sexual harassment, said Bernice Sandler, senior associate at the Center for Women Policy Studies in Washington, D.C.

"If you go back 20 years, we didn't even have a word for sexual harassment," said Sandler, editor of the magazine About Women on Campus.

"Most schools have policies these days, and most are groping on how to handle these issues a little bit better."

While universities are stepping up security to stem sexual assault and other violent crimes, many have chosen education as a way of preventing other kinds of harassment.

Part of the problem is defining sexual harassment, which often constitutes ambiguous looks or comments, said Paula Rudolph, sexual harassment officer at the University of California-Santa Barbara.

"Much of it has to do with the perception of the people experiencing it," Rudolph said. "What may feel like sexual harassment to one person may not feel like it to another. . . There's a lot of gray."

A video available to students, entitled Drawing the Line: Sexual Harassment On Campus, helps explain the issue, Rudoph said. The video uses actors playing out scenes of sexual harassment.

At MIT, the anti-harassment tools are part of a plan to change cultural attitudes about sex, gender and power, said Samuel Jay Keyser, associate provost for institute life.

"Sexual harassment is rarely about sex," Keyser said. "It's almost always about power. When you live in a society in which power is important, then

Julia Child on campus today

Famed chef, Smith alumna to take part in panel

by BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

Julia Child, a well-known chef and author who has been teaching America how to cook for more than thirty years, will be participating in a panel discussion titled "Academic Excellence in the Culinary Arts" today at 1:25 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Child, who currently lives in Cambridge, Mass., has published several volumes on cooking, beginning with The French Chef Cookbook in 1968 and most recently The Way To Cook.

Born and raised in Pasadena, Cal., Child graduated from Smith College in 1934. She began her studies in the culinary arts at the Cordon Bleu when her husband Paul, who worked with the State Department, was transferred to Paris.

Her culinary career took off in 1951 when she co-founded the cooking school L'Ecole des Trois Gourmandes with Simone Beck and Louisette Bertholle in Paris. The two later co-authored the well-known classic Mastering the Art of French Cooking with Child.

In 1961, America began watching Julia Child on public television's "The French Chef," which was developed by WGBH in Boston.

In 1978, "Julia Child and Company" began airing on television, and was soon followed by "Julia Child and More Company." Two books were developed from the shows.

She received the Ordre du Merite Agricole from the French government in 1972, and the Antonin Careme Medal in 1974 from the Chefs' Association of the Pacific.

Other books include From Julia Child's Kitchen, Julia Child and Company and Julia Child and More Company.

Her visit to the campus will include a tour of the Chenoweth Food Lab, and a special luncheon prepared by HRTA 367. She will also be visiting HRTA 293, which is part of a five-year-old program to train disabled individuals for jobs in the food industry.

Commissioner of ed. appointed

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state Board of Education named a new education commissioner Tuesday, more than seven months after the last commissioner resigned to protest budget cuts.

Robert Antonucci, 46, currently Falmouth schools superintendent, inherits an educational system that has been paralyzed by spending cuts and is in the midst of a debate about a reform.

He called the job a challenge.

"I think that's the best word to describe it," Antonucci said. "But it's a challenge I expect to meet with enthusiasm and with a great degree of optimism."

Even as the vote was being taken, students and teachers from Methuen became the latest group to march on the Statehouse to criticize the budget for public schools.

The state has had no permanent education commissioner since August, when Harold Raynolds, Jr. quit to protest budget cuts and differences with Gov. William F. Weld over the reform debate.

That leaves Antonucci to take office in the middle of a battle.

"I would have rather been in at the beginning," he said.

But backers stressed that Antonucci, former president of the Massachusetts Association of School Superintendents, has extensive state experience that will compensate for lack of time.

"It's not like he's been off on an island somewhere," board Chairman James Crain said.

"He has been in Massachusetts and he has been involved," said state Education Secretary Piedad Robertson.

Antonucci's selection came after a search committee

Broken pipe closes street

Traffic rerouted, water supply cut to fix main pipe

A town water pipe on North Pleasant Street cracked open Monday night forcing police to shut down a section of the street for several hours and shut off the water supply to neighboring buildings, according to University officials.

Four town workers and four University physical plant workers worked about 12 hours through the night to fix the cracked water main pipe near the Stockbridge bus stop, said Jeff Price, foreman of the plumbing shop at the University.

Amherst police discovered the broken pipe at 9:30 p.m. Monday night and alerted local officials since the bubbling water was turning into a hazardous sheet of ice, Price said.

PVTA buses were rerouted, causing a temporary inconvenience for students. Water was restored to all buildings yesterday by 12:15 p.m.

"It was probably old age," Price said of the reason for the cracked water main. "It's a very antiquated system."

A University spokesperson said water was temporarily shut off to the Fine Arts Center, Newman Center, Mahar, School of Management, Graduate Research Center, Hasbrouck, Arnold and two residence halls — Hamlin and Knowlton.

Price praised the cooperation and teamwork between town and University officials to fix the pipe.

"We seem to work well with the town," Price said.

Group urges Holocaust awareness

By DAVID MOHEBAN
Collegian Correspondent

Anti-Semitism is on the rise in the United States, according to Paula Yolles, a senior elementary education major at the University of Massachusetts, and a member of the Hillel Holocaust Awareness Planning committee.

"A lot of people in the world don't think that the Holocaust could happen again," Yolles said. "Through education, people become more aware, so as not to forget."

The Hillel Holocaust Awareness Planning committee strives to educate students, faculty and the community about the reality of the Holocaust through movies, lectures and other events.

Personal reasons, having family members who are Holocaust survivors, and the duty to remember and increase awareness about the Holocaust are just some of the reasons why students are involved in the committee.

Not only were six million Jews killed, but so were six million non-Jews, said Julie Wiener, a junior environmental science major. "It's not only a Jewish tragedy. . .it's everyone's tragedy."

"The reason why I'm involved is because it's part of my background," Yolles said, "Judaism, it's who I am."

Lisa Katz, a sophomore microbiology major and president of Hillel council got involved for personal reasons. "My grandparents were survivors. Knowing that, living it and breathing it, ingrained that into an integral part of me. I have my own small family but my grandparents lost theirs. The neo-Nazis really make me tremble, I can't believe that they say it never happened. It's a frightening reality that these groups are gaining power."

Survivors are the best evidence we have that the Holocaust took place, Katz said. Because they are dying, she said, "it's so important for the second and third generation to tell and record their stories."

"The Holocaust was a horrible scar in the existence of society," said Yehudit Heller, program director of Hillel. "Just like radio-active effects, it stays in the system forever. . .these are scars that will never heal. At the same time, it happened, people let it happen, it has to be discussed.

"This committee is a teamwork, everybody comes with very serious reasons and brings something from themselves to put in it," Heller said.

The committee is currently in the process of planning for Holocaust Awareness Month, which begins in April, and will feature several guest lectures, movies, poetry and discussion. The committee meets Tuesday evenings at 6:30 p.m. at the Hillel House.

Rocket prank results in arrest

Compiled By MARK PRESTON

Peter J. Chalfin, 18, of Morganville, N.J., was arrested Monday night and charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, disturbing the peace and possession of fireworks.

He was arrested after police investigated a complaint that a woman was hit in the leg by a bottle rocket fired from the fourth floor of Patterson Residence Hall.

Reward offered for info on callbox vandalism

The University of Massachusetts' Division of Public Safety is offering a $500 reward for any information leading to the arrest and conviction of anyone damaging an emergency callbox.

The 67 emergency callboxes are located on campus outside residential and academic buildings and in parking lots and bus shelters.

They are easily recognized because they are yellow with maroon lettering. The boxes also have blue lights above them so they are obvious for people to see.

"We're saying to the community, 'help us so that we can better serve you,'" said Lawrence Holmes, the division's associate director.

The callboxes serve two purposes for the people who use them. The main purpose is to provide a direct link with police, but they also allow for three minute on-campus telephone calls. Also, the callboxes are able to record the location of the caller.

Although the award money is being offered by the Division of Public Safety, it is being made possible by Housing Services.

The campus' original 10-callbox system received only $1000 in damage over 10 years, said Holmes.

The cost of vandalism to UMass' new emergency telecommunications system has topped the $5,500 mark in just one year, he said.

The new callbox system was installed when UMass' entire phone system was replaced in 1990.

Former UMass physicist dies

Pioneer headed UMass astrophysics lab

(AP) — John Donovan Strong, a pioneer astronomer and physicist who discovered water vapor in the atmosphere of Venus, has died. He was 87.

The Lawrence, Kan. native developed a vacuum process for depositing aluminum on glass in 1932 that was used to coat mirrors for astronomical telescopes, including the 200-inch mirror at the Mt. Palomar Observatory in California.

He also discovered a method of increasing the speed of astronomical instruments by applying anti-reflection coatings to telescopic optics.

Strong, a fellow of the American Academy of Sciences, taught at Johns Hopkins University, the California Institute of Technology, and the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

He headed the UMass laboratory of astrophysics, and physical meteorology from 1967 to 1975.

Strong died Saturday at the Amherst Nursing Home.

He is survived by his wife, Bethany June, and two daughters.

Funeral arrangements were incomplete.

chose another candidate, but then postponed the final choice while both were questioned on their attitudes about reform proposals.

"We all know both candidates much better and are in a better position to make our selection than we were before," said Richard R. Rowe, a member of the search committee.

Some commissioners said later they preferred the other candidate, Norwalk, Conn., school Superintendent Ralph E. Sloan, because he had experience in urban schools.

Weld favored a third candidate who was not a finalist, and it was one of his appointees to the board who called for the delay. But while the panel ultimately switched its support from Sloan to Antonucci, it refused to reconsider the other prospects.

"It's not a political game," said William D. Irwin, Jr., vice chairman of the board, who backed Sloan. "It's for the education of our children."

But Irwin joined the unanimous vote for Antonucci Tuesday, saying afterward: "I'm glad the issue is over and we can move on."

Editorial/Opinion

Why won't women test themselves?

How powerful are you? That was what I read on one of the exhibits at the Boston Museum of Science. It was a bicycle that when used, built up enough energy to light four light bulbs which were connected and enclosed in a glass case. The first light bulb lit up after some effort and there after each one was more difficult to light up. I stood there for a short time to see people try it — or should I say I watched men try it.

Stacy Malone

First I saw a couple of young boys each take turns at pedalling and after they could only light up a couple of the bulbs they became discouraged. They walked away convincing themselves in a few years they would be able to make them all glow. It seemed as though very few single men straddled the exhibit, but when they did they were watched from afar by young women. The women seemed interested in watching the men measure their power, but they themselves did not seem to consider measuring their own. Did they feel as though they had no power to measure? Were they intimidated that so many men found it necessary to measure their own power? Did the women just think that the whole concept of pedalling a bike to measure your power was stupid? Were the men participating in the exhibit to show that they had power or to determine exactly how powerful they were? Then again, did it just happen that I picked a day where men were in a bicycling mood and women were not?

I saw man after man work to light up those light bulbs and finally become hopeful when three women and a man approached. The man hopped right on the bicycle, proved himself and then began to coax the women he was with. Why did he find it so exhilarating to light four light bulbs and when he did accomplish his goal why did he feel a need to tease the women? Didn't the women want to see how powerful they were? Didn't it bother them that the man they were with was claiming he was the most powerful? Apparently not. They walked away snidely joking with one another. I thought for sure that one out of those three women would have knocked him off the bicycle seat and lit all four of those light bulbs up. Guess not! But why not? Did they just not feel the desire to or did they think that they shouldn't?

After awhile I was sick of watching men mount the bicycle seat and gleam when they had achieved the almighty power of making those four light bulbs glow and I began to walk away. Then a young girl brushed by me and jumped right on the exhibit. Her feet barely touched the pedals, but she tried harder than anyone else I had seen. Her teeth gritted, her legs stretched and knuckles turned pure white from grasping the handle bars of the bike. She barely lit two light bulbs, but was not discouraged by any means.

She had the power of opportunity to jump on that bike. The opportunity that other women had passed up, but the opportunity was there. It bestowed me with hope to see that this young girl saw she had the opportunity to do so. Whether she pedaled with determination because she was an energetic child or that she was curious to know how much power she had, I don't know. I do know that it was encouraging to see a female of a younger generation take an opportunity without considering her gender when so many other women of older generations that day declined such an opportunity. That young girl had more power than the women, because she realized and accepted the opportunities before her. She gave herself the power and the opportunity and did not let her sex as a female discourage her.

Stacy Malone is a UMass student.

Weaver is foolish and immature

Bored, bored, bored, bored. I refer to Robin Weaver's feminist bashing article. Oh dear, we have to go back to basics, don't we? A kind of Bert and Ernie style learning about why feminist bashing is not a sensible thing to do. One, because you are likely to get yourself into trouble with your sisters, and yes, we call you 'sister' because you are a woman; and two, because you have just fallen hook, line and sinker for the patriarchical line of 'reasoning' against feminism and feminists.

I am sure that I will stop considering myself female first and foremost when, and only when, men stop raping women, men stop sexually assaulting women, men stop sexually abusing children, when men don't masturbate in public places where I can see, when truck drivers stop calling out I'd be a good [expletive], when sexist jokes don't exist, when pornography stops beating up on women, and when women stop dying at the hands of back-street abortionists.

I will not bother myself explaining the fundamentals of existence for a woman in a patriarchal society and yes, we do live in a patriarchy. But I wish to say this, don't patronize women and don't come up with [expletive] that does about as much for the promotion of positive images of women as George Bush has done for the Equal Rights Amendment.

Your utter contempt, Robby babe, for women, is indicative of your foolishness and your immaturity. It is clear that you do not have the slightest clue about feminist politics: no, we do not "mourn" housewives and mothers (only economic poverty and lack of opportunities open to them due to low child care benefits and non-existent day care facilities). We do not "mourn" them because motherhood is just one of the many "divine" aspects of being a woman.

If you were to write an editorial saying that Black people should stop harping on about their Black identity and civil rights, and that lesbians, gays and bisexuals should stop obsessing with their sexuality and find something else to do, you would be in for much criticism. Why do you feel that you get away with it where women are concerned? You are a product of a very nasty society and have obviously internalized sexism and its reprecussions.

Well, after all that I have to say that I am confused. When Stewart-Liberty tells us that we look like men and Weaver tells us to stop glorifying ourselves as women and to act more like men, what do we do? Well personally, I like to slap on loads of red lipstick and sink a cold one at SheeAnn's — maybe I'll mutter about the patriarchy, maybe I won't. But let me tell you this . . .if sisterhood freaks you out babe, then sisterhood is powerful.

U.S. yes, but Japan bashing, no

As a staunch conservative and a firm believer in free-market, I have to but disagree with Patrick Buchanan on the issue of protectionism. Of course, I am not alone. A fellow conservative columnist and t.v. commentator Robert Novak in the August 1991 issue of The American Spectator infers correctly of his "disagreement with Buchanan's nationalistic stands on trade...which are bad politics and bad policy." He also adds that "the neocon dispute hardly justifies writing Buchanan out of the conservative movement. The right — as well as the left — is split on trade and immigration, so Buchanan is by no means isolated in his views." Hence, singling out Buchanan's protectionism as a racist demagogery against Japanese practices is not only wrong, it's just plain silly.

Since the 50th anniversary of Pearl Harbor, Japanophobia has been on the rise and it is outright Japan-bashing. Accusations waged against Japanese are "unstoppable economic expansion," "cannot cope with Japanese power or fathom Japanese intentions," and "unnaturalness of the arrangement in the Japanese political economy."

Not surprisingly, the conservative National Review, on Dec. 30, 1991, in a column entitled, "An economic Pearl Harbor?" suggests facts that tell a different story about the Japanese-American trade relationship. "...Japanese bought more U.S. products last year — $395 per person — than Americans bought Japanese products — $359 per person. More importantly, Japan devotes a larger share of its GNP to the purchase of goods from the U.S. than we devote of our GNP to the purchase of goods from Japan.

"Since peaking in 1987, Japan's trade surplus with the U.S. has fallen by $15.3 billion, or 27 per cent. U.S. exports to Japan grew 33.4 per cent in 1988, 18.2 per cent in 1989 and another 9.2 per cent in 1990 — faster than the growth of exports to the rest of the world." Nearly two-thirds of U.S. exports to Japan are manufactured goods — chemicals, aluminum, aircraft, scientific instrument computers and many other products. About half of these — 30 per cent of all U.S. exports to Japan — are considered "high tech" by the Commerce Dept. This economic interdependence, in reality, has been more than fair towards the U.S. — more so than to Japan. The Japanese consumer is only 60 per cent as well off as his/her American counterpart.

Last word is, it is democrat Richard Gephart's "protectionist" bill before the congress that will do more harm to U.S. than presidential candidate Pat Buchanan's flippant remarks.

Pedestrians and bikers take heed

Due to circumstances beyond my control, I was forced to abandon riding my bike across campus this past Monday. Seems like no big deal, right? A simple change in daily routine is commonplace in our busy world. Its a little more complicated than that. The disruption of Monday's routine forced me to approach the world of pedestrianism a little differently.

Diana D'Avanzo

Let me try to explain.

You see, when you ride a bike across campus you see things from an entirely different perspective. When tire-born you are not the helpless individual trying to get from your room in Southwest to your computers class in Lederle in less than six minutes.

No, you are super student — able to leave your room three minutes before class time, no matter where the lecture is, and be there one minute early. With your trusty mountain bike ready to assist you down windy paths, up steep hills and across treacherous roads, you are invincible. You will not be late for class (unless, of course, you oversleep. But that's a different story)

With this bike, this freedom, comes an entirely different set of rules. When speeding across campus, they, the lowly pedestrians, are the enemy. We zoom past them without a second thought and, the minute they make a wrong move, we make a mental note of who they are and single them out as troublemakers, not to be trusted, unable to walk in a straight line for any distance.

This is what I thought until speaking to a few of my friends— technically the enemy.

They insisted that the bike toting students were the ones to blame for, well, everything. So, when I could not ride my own bike to classes I decided to take notes. This is what I found: I was wrong! No, I'm serious. I really was wrong.

You see, walking past the Fine Arts Center on my way to Herter I decided to go around a puddle so as not to get my feet wet (so I didn't have my boots either, sue me!) Suddenly this guy comes zooming past me, nearly knocked me over and then had the nerve to give me, the innocent victim, a dirty, filthy, if-looks-could- kill stare. What? He wasn't watching were he was going and I'm to blame? What do I have, eyes behind my head or something? How was I supposed to see him.

Amazingly, similar incidents haunted me for the rest of the day. I was so annoyed that I thought I might write a letter to the editor.

Then I realized something. I might be one of those rude riders.

How many times do I ride up behind people and just assume that they will proceed in the straight or diagonal line that they are walking in? Or, how about riding really fast, lets say down a hill, just to set the scene, when a group of people in front of you decides to stop where they are.

It never crosses your mind that they would even consider stopping andso, you just barely miss running into the whole lot of them—and then blame them for being inconsiderate.

The point is, both of us, bicyclists and pedestrians, must respect the paths of the other. We can not assume that they will adhere to our rules. They have t heir own rules.

Look, no one said it was going to be easy. Here's a bit of advice: Next time you are walking across campus, look behind you before taking that left. Next time you are riding across campus, stay as far away from them as possible. They will thank you for it.

what you expect to find is people developing strategies for control.

"We need to replace the ascendancy of power with decency and civility."

An MIT survey at two undergraduate dormitories last year showed that 47 percent of the women and 9 percent of men had experienced upsetting harassment.

And 24 percent of women and 4 percent of men said the harassment had interfered with their education and work performance, according to the survey.

The harassment included sexually suggestive jokes and gestures, unwanted pressure for dates and attempted rape, Keyser said.

"It's a negative sum game," he said. "Once a harassment takes place, both parties are permanently harmed by it."

HSCN brings Buckaroo Banzai to your set

By JAMIE GORNSTEIN

Hello, movie lovers! Hope you had a fantastic Spring Break, but if you're sporting one of those perfect tans, then just stay away from me and my paleness. I hope you have a great time peeling. Anyway, not to digress from the column, there are many fine (and not so fine) flicks that will be shown this week via the Housing Services Cable Network. Now, here are the movies that will be shown beginning Wednesday, March 25.

Goin' South—Jack Nicholson, Mary Steenburgen, John Belushi. Directed by and starring Jack Nicholson, this film tells the tale of a Western outlaw who is saved from the gallows by spinster Steenburgen. Okay, yes, Jack is a top-rate actor, one of the best of his time (second only to DeNiro) but as a director, just average. The humor just isn't consistent, but a decent attempt. Jack, PLEASE stick to the drama films. . . trust me, they are your forte. **

Fire With Fire—Craig Sheffer, Virginia Madsen, Jon Polito. Oh God, not another film that features teens who are misunderstood, yet manage to triumph against all odds. Yawn. Didn't HBO get a hold of this disaster a few years back and play it repeatedly? Bleah. It's a story about a girls' Catholic school who invites a neighboring boys' (get this) reform school over for a dance. Mild sex gets this garbage hopping a tad, but it has no decent plot, I must say. I'm told this is a true story. Good Lord. No stars.

Flashback—Dennis Hopper, Kiefer Sutherland, Carol Kane. Kiefer's an FBI agent assigned to hippie Hopper (hey, say that out loud. Kinda funny, huh?) who is being brought to Oregon where he has to stand trial for political activities in which he particpated in the 60s. Wait a minute, isn't this kinda like that movie "Midnight Run" with Robert DeNiro and Charles Grodin? Hey, I smell a writer with no original ideas. And this movie was made two years after "Midnight Run." Survey says. . . COPYCAT! But it gets some points for acting. **

Hiding Out—Jon Cryer, Keith Coogan, Annabeth Gish. Eh, another HBO play-over-and-over-again. Cryer is a stockbroker who is "hiding out" from the mob in a Delaware high school. It's kinda cute, but not super-spectacular. Cryer's acting is above average, but the plot isn't, so it basically evens out to average. What the heck, if you've got 98 minutes to kill, it's worth watching. **

House Party—Christopher Reid, Robin Harris, Christopher Martin. Featuring real-life rapper Reid, who plays Kid, the movie is a humorous tale of teenagers and the events of one night before, during, and after a house party. Lots o' fun! ***

Regarding Henry—Harrison Ford, Annette Bening. Ford is a man obsessed with his career who finds little time for his family but is engaged in an affair when he gets shot in a convenience store. He loses his memory and must relearn how to read, write, etc., and he turns into a really nice guy. ****

Roxanne—Steve Martin, Daryl Hannah, Rick Rossovich. Call me a softie, but the song that plays when the ending credits roll does something to me every single time I watch it. I cry every time. This movie is a modern version of "Cyrano De Bergerac" with Martin as a large-nosed fire chief and Hannah as a beautiful blonde astronomer. The film is sweet and romantic, but it misses something along the way that I can't quite put my finger on. An enjoyable effort nonetheless. ***

Stand By Me—Wil Wheaton, River Phoenix, Corey Feldman. Has anyone out there NOT seen this movie? It's actually based on a novella by Stephen King called "The Body," and I'm told it is a true story. If you don't know the plot, call me and I'll tell you. And don't you agree that River Phoenix was much cuter at thirteen than he is now? 1/2

Three Fugitives—Nick Nolte, Martin Short, Sarah Rowland Doroff. Director Francis Veber's remake of his own French comedy, Les Fugitifs. Nolte is an ex-con innocently mistaken for a bank robber when he is taken hostage by the bumbling Short. The film is cute, and the little girl is even cuter (you just want to hug her and take her home with you), but the ending will make you say "duh." Too bad, but I did like the movie. 1/2

Top Secret—Val Kilmer, Lucy Gutteridge, Christopher Villiers. Let me tell you, any film that the Zucker brothers direct has potential (Airplane!, The Naked Gun, etc.). I feel this movie did not get the credit it deserved. Kilmer is a rock star who becomes embroiled in espionage while touring in East Germany. It seems to lack an ending, but there are some unprecedented funny scenes. 1/2

The Verdict—Paul Newman, Charlotte Rampling, Jack Warden. Very few "court" movies have packed as much punch as this one did. Director Sidney Lumet took the screenplay — by David Mamet from the novel by Barry Reed — and transformed it into a powerful courtroom drama about a down-and-out Boston lawyer who finally has a case he believes in. Simply wonderful. ****

Young Frankenstein—Gene Wilder, Peter Boyle, Marty Feldman. You can ask any of my friends. . . I can recite this movie just about verbatim. The film is an absolute RIOT! Director Mel Brooks has done it again; he took the Mary Shelley Frankenstein and made such a parody. . . oy gevalt! I'm feeling a little faklempt. Talk amongst yourselves. . . it passed. Who knew? Feldman as Igor (pronounced "Eyegore") is beyond hysterical. ****

The Adventures of Buckaroo Banzai Across the Eighth Dimension (a.k.a. Buckaroo Banzai)—Peter Weller, John Lithgow, Ellen Barki, Jeff Goldblum. Bizarre cult hit about a hero who's a physicist, rock star, surgeon, rocket car driver and government troubleshooter. Whew! It's somewhat hard to follow, and not particularly enjoyable, but it's kinda fun if you like that type of movie. **

Boyz N The Hood—Ice Cube, Cuba Gooding Jr., Morris Chestnut, Larry Fishburne. A touching, down-to-earth film about a father-son relationship as it endures time as well as negative and poitive outside influences. It addresses (tastefully) the issues of AIDS, drugs and street violence. A top choice movie. ****

Coming to America—Eddie Murphy, Arsenio Hall, James Earl Jones. Surprising role-reversal for Murphy, as no four letterdr words emerge from his mouth! He's a sweet prince from a royal family in Africa whodecides he wants to be his own person and choose his own wife. Arsenio is hysterical, and Murphy is charming. (Did I really just use that word to describe Eddie?). Anyway, you can't miss it. Oh, and don't forget to look for cameo appearances of two roles from Trading Places. 1/2

Movies that aren't reviewd include The Unbelievable Truth, Late for Dinner and Children of Paradise.

Black Affairs

Exiled Haitian President Jean-Betrand Aristide speaks during a news conference at the U.N. building in Geneva.

U.S. continues injustice against Haiti

Haiti was the first Black Republic to ever defeat Napoleon's army, despite the fact that Haiti barely had any ammunition. The defeat of Napoleon's army lead Haitians to gain their independence on Jan. 2, 1804. Haiti's victory inspired some countries in Latin America and in Africa to fight for their own independence.

Haiti helped some of these countries fight for their independence. Haiti was dubbed the "Pearl of the West Indies" because of its wealth, rich culture, beaches, and natural resources. The Haitian economy suffered after the occupation of the United States (1915-1942).

Now Haiti is the poorest country in the western hemisphere.

The U.S. government has supported the regime of the Duvaliers from father to son, as the rulers of Haiti and its people.

Haitians overthrew the dictatorship government that controlled the country's wealth from 1957 to 1986. The goal of the revolt was to establish a democratic government that would be for the people.

Despite many struggles against three governments succeeding the regime of the Duvaliers, Haitians have found hope in a priest by the name of Jean-Bertrand Aristide (TiTid).

Gaining control last February, TiTid restored pride and dignity in Haitians all over the world. TiTid appeased their plight and sorrows while giving them a new identity.

Haitians once again became proud of who they are. Depite the negative stereotypes, which exist especially in the United States, this pride is one which is very strong Hope was restored in Haiti to become the "Pearl of the West Indies" once again. France, Canada, Venezuela and other countries offered to help build a new Haitian government, one that was for the progress of the people and not for the United States.

Upon noticing that the freely elected president was gaining the world's approval, the U.S. government decided to overthrow TiTid.

The U.S. arranged a coup d'etat with a couple of Haitian military men. When they overthrew TiTid, the dreams of all Haitians disappeared. Haitians decided they would die for something they believed in, and vowed to fight until they restored their president's power.

More than a thousand people were found dead all over the streets of Port-au-Prince.

Tony Joassainte

Unlike the United States, France, Canada, Venezuela and San Salvador were opposed to the unjust coup.

Finally, after being pressured by other countries, the United States decided to intervene a week later by imposing an embargo on Haiti.

This "embargo" was violated many times right in front of the United States.

During the seven months that Aristide was in power, the people of Haiti were content. One month after the defeat of Aristide, many Haitians arrived in the United States in boats.

Not since the Duvaliers' regime has the United States seen Haitians arrive in boats. Thus the fact that anyone, even Dan Quayle, can see that these people are political refugees and not "economical" refugees, as they have been labeled.

The United States gave the refugees $15 and sent them back to Haiti. This is a slap in the face! Does the United States really think that after they return to Haiti these people will be safe? If the United States believes these people will be safe when they return to Haiti, then U.S. stands for "Utterly Stupid"!

When political refuges from other parts of the world came to the United States they were welcomed with open arms. Why were not the Haitians treated in this fashion? There is no need to beat around the "Bush." The United States did not want them here, because they are of a darker shade than the refugees who preceded their arrival.

I would like "ALL" students and others who are aware of this injustice to stand up and help the Haitian community make their voices heard. This is one step that must be taken in order to stop the injustices against Haitians.

To all Haitians students, whatever happened to "l' Union Fait la Force?" Are you going to sit back and watch your ancestors disrespected? Are you going to watch your people die?

I know that many of you Haitian students were not born in Haiti, but I know that you are concerned of what people will think when you tell them that you are indeed Haitian.

Who cares what they think! Don't believe the hype! I want you to know that you have the richest history in the western hemisphere, and a lot to be proud of. This is a good time for all of us, whether you are African, Latin American, European, Asian or American, to unite and fight against this injustice against the people of Haiti.

Remember, "Unity is Strength." Peace and love to all my brothers and sisters.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You could be riding the crest of popularity now. Your captivating manner and gift of gab make you the center of attention. Take your show on the road.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Trying out a new look could work to your advantage. It is high time you cleared up a misunderstanding. Showing more compassion bridges the generation gap.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Avoid all authority figures today and forget about career pressures. Steal away to someplace new or unusual with a favorite companion. Focusing on spiritual values refreshes your soul.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Take a break from your domestic routine and have some fun. See the sights or do something out of the ordinary. An unexpected incident could shake up your love life.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A busy pace seems to suit you now. Set out on a shopping expedition or work on a pet project. New job opportunities present themselves. Put romance on the back burner.

look into this global warming deal, but it can wait until the Tournament's over.

• As if there was a need for incentives to get you Uptown tomorrow night, there's an opportunity to win valuable cash and prizes for the simple skill of shooting a Nerf ball. Vanna White is rumored to be hosting the contest — just follow the crowd.

• Apologies to the UMass Ski Team for the story that was, but was not there. Space was limited and the season ended at an inopportune time. Suffice to say the interview with Jen Egan, Scott Levine and Marci Blacker was entertaining. Egan's comment, "I ski for the thrill of it," should be the team's motto.

• The happiest men in Boyden as a result of the hoop team's success? Frank McInerney and David Bischoff. Attention has been drawn away from the troubled football program for the moment.

• That, by the way is one of the great underlying stories to this "Cinderella Season." Amidst all these budget cuts and in the aftermath of the Jim Reid fiasco, a group of determined guys in shorts and tank tops have brought temporary joy to a campus, a community and quite possibly a state.

• Is the whole NHL on strike yet, or just the Bruins?

• Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on the Final Four.

To be perfectly honest, I don't care what you did for break and if more people would share this attitude we could get on with important conversation topics, such as:

• The "cut from the same cloth" hype surrounding Rick Pitino's coaching battle with John Calipari is almost as annoying as CBS's repetitive shot of Syracuse's Mike Hopkins holding an ice bag on his head. Enough already, bottom line is it's the players who shoot the rock, not the coaches. About the only thing we don't know about Pitino at this point is whether he wears jockeys or boxers, and by tipoff we could very well know. (Safe money's on jockeys.)

• Reliable sources (or imaginary friends) have assured me that Coach Cal will remain in Amherst for at least one more year in order to get another shot at the coveted "Cravat King" trophy.

David Scott

The contest, which honors the most consistent wearer of exquisite neckwear during the basketball season, was won by ME, in a cakewalk. Cal had one chance left at the West Virginia game, but when it came down to mano a mano, the cigar toting columnist pulled out the Van Gogh of all ties and Cal was left wearing a page from a children's coloring book. There is always next year, but honestly if you were Cal, would you stay here?

• Never thought you'd see a birth announcement on the sports page? Congratulations to the Hadley Farm's proud mommas, Olympique (Que) and Charisma, on the birth of their beautiful, bouncing foals — Narcissus and Navigator. In lieu of cigars, the colts have been handing out carrots. Big Cuban carrots.

• Maybe it's just my imagination, but are the seasons being reversed? Someone's really got to

Wins give UMass good image

By TAMIR LIPTON

John Calipari has exactly what he has complained about for four years now.

All the publicity he can handle and then some.

But even the fourth year basketball coach at the University of Massachusetts is a bit overwhelmed with it all.

Monday, Calipari was sitting in his office and Senator Kennedy called to congratulate him on advancing to the Sweet 16 of the NCAA Tournament. He was so excited, that when he hung up, he jumped up out of his seat and ran to the other room to tell someone about his phone conversation.

The media demand has been so great, that even Calipari, who thrives on the publicity has had to cancel some appointments and stop taking phone calls he normally takes.

While the team and Calipari prepare for tomorrow night's game with Kentucky (7:40 p.m.), the coach realizes what is happening now will strengthen his program in the years to come.

Calipari has said repeatedly that image and perception is what it's all about. Two years ago, the team's motto was "We're a first class program."

Now, everyone knows now what they knew then.

"When I first got involved with the job, it was more to get an interview than to take the job," Calipari said. "The perception out there was that they [UMass] didn't care about the basketball team. That the state didn't even know they had a basketball team.

"When I came up here and I looked at the campus, I looked how close it was to recruiting areas," he said. "Which I think is a key. Boston is an hour-and-a-half away. Hartford is an hour away. New York is two and-a-half-hours away."

After looking around the campus, hearing about the Mullins Arena, talking to academic people and the players, Calipari knew he could "get it done here."

Ironically it was Kentucky coach Rick Pitino, a UMass grad, who was on the committee which hired Calipari.

"I talked to Rick Pitino," Calipair said. "And he told me about the commitment that was going to be here. But until I got up here, I really didn't believe it. I didn't know what kind of school it was.

"When I took over, there were three or four kids who were division two players," he said. "I told them that they probably wouldn't play here. I told them they'd practice, travel and that I'd work with them and I asked them if they wanted me to find another school? They said absolutely not, they liked going to school here."

Just how much has all this publicity helped UMass?

Donta Bright, one of the top high school players in the country was leaning heavily toward Ohio State a few weeks ago. Now, he's leaning to UMass.

Softball opens season with 2-7 California trip

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts softball team, ranked 17th in the pre-season, returned from its Spring Break trip to California with a 2-7 record.

"While our record looks rather suspicious," said head coach Elaine Sortino, "we've got seven losses to nationally ranked teams. We have the toughest schedule in the northeast.

"I guess a testimony to our schedule is the fact that with a 2-7 record we were the unanimous choice by the regional committee as the number one team in the region."

The problem the Minutewomen faced was two-fold. First, due to the season's weather and field conditions, the team has only been able to practice in the Boyden Gym. Second, all the teams UMass faced have played over 20 games already.

Massachusetts 11, Santa Clara 0
Massachusetts 14, Santa Clara 0

The Minutewomen waxed the Broncos twice to start off the week. In game one, senior Holly Aprile and freshman Kelly Daut combined to hold Santa Clara to only two hits, while striking out eight.

Senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas led the 16-hit barrage with a 3-for-5 effort, including a home run, three RBIs, and two runs scored. The Minutewomen also left 11 runners on base.

In game two, junior pitcher Darlene Claffey threw a no-hitter while walking four and striking out six.

The hitting was led by freshman leftfielder Angyla Brumm, who knocked in four runs on two hits. Senior shortstop Barbara Marean went 3-4 and scored four runs, and Aprile added a homerun.

Arizona State 2, Massachusetts 1
Sacramento State 8, Massachusetts 6

After two days of inclement weather forced the cancellation of a double-header against the Sun Devils, a split bill was played.

Against Arizona State, who had played 28 games, Claffey threw three illegal pitches in the first inning, walking three and loading the bases. One of the runs was forced in on a third strike illegal pitch, both in the first inning, prompting Sortino to say, "I can't even tell you how disruptive that was to her."

Aprile was reached early by Sacramento State, and UMass was down 8-4 in the last inning. The Minutewomen loaded the bases with two out and had Aprile, one of the team's best hitters, up at the plate, but that is how the game ended.

"We were extremely competitive," Sortino said, "in a situation that, between the weather and the frustration [of the Arizona State game], we could have hung our heads and gotten buried, but we didn't."

Cal-Berkeley 5, Massachusetts 0
Cal-Berkeley 4, Massachusetts 1

Michelle Granger, who Sortino describes as "the best pitcher in the country," held UMass to only two hits in the first game, while striking out 13. Claffey pitched five scoreless innings, but when she was replaced by Daut, the freshman was lit up for four hits and all five runs in one inning.

Game two saw another fine performance by a Bears pitcher, as Robin Burgess held the Minutewomen to only four hits while striking out five. Daut started and allowed two hits and three runs in the first one-third of an inning. Claffey replaced her and allowed only one run on three hits the rest of the way.

Fresno State 8, Massachusetts 2

The Bulldogs had 10 hits off Claffey (1-2), but three UMass errors led to three unearned runs. Bulldog pitcher Terry Carpenter scattered six hits over seven innings while striking out five.

Fresno State 6, Massachusetts 2

Errors were again a problem, as two Minutewomen miscues led to two unearned runs. Aprile (0-3) surrendered nine hits while walking five and striking out two. Marean went 3-4 with a triple and knocked in two runs.

Fresno State 3, Massachusetts 0

The Minutewomen's frustration against the Bulldogs continued, as UMass could muster only three hits off of Marcie Green. The error bug hit again, as three infield errors led to two unearned runs. Daut gave up five hits while striking out one.

Trip notes - Marean's .470 average, nine runs scored, four RBI and four triples during the week earned her the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week honor.

New year, new faces for UMass baseball

By CHRIS CUDDY and
MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

Change is one word that can be used to describe the University of Massachusetts baseball team this year.

Gone is the heart of the UMass lineup: catcher Derek Dana (signed by the San Fransisco Giants), right fielder Brian Bright (signed by the Boston Red Sox), shortstop Glen DiSarcina (signed by the Chicago White Sox), and leadoff hitter/centerfielder Mike Tobin. Dave Edwards graduated and Chris Robidoux did not return.

But the team has a lot of talent returning and a few promising newcomers. The pitching staff remains intact and may be stronger.

Left-hander Ron Villone has been converted from the stopper to the number one starter. Villone (4-3, 4 saves last year) has the ability to hurl 90 mile-an-hour fastballs past opposing hitters, as he did in last week's two-hit, 17 strikeout outing versus Central Florida. He also could walk in runs or get pounded by the opposition, as he was by Florida during UMass' season opener.

"We didn't agonize over switching Ron," Stone said. "He hadn't pitched for two years before last year, and needs to pitch a lot.

"Right now we don't have a definite stopper, but we have four starters, which is what you need in the Atlantic 10."

Rounding out the starting rotation is righty Rich Graham and southpaw Scott Meaney in the two and three spots in the rotation, with Stone saying the last spot was still up in the air.

Steve Corradi and captain John Carelli will anchor the middle infield. Jay Dodig is the probable starter at first, and Stone said third will be contested by Joe Mattivello and Kevin Correa.

"Greg [LaRocca] swings the bat very well," he said. "He will probably lead off and play center.."

In the outfield Justin Howard returns to left, LaRocca in center, and freshman Billy Knight is the probable right fielder.

With Lou Olivieri returning for his senior year, the catching for UMass looks strong despite Dana's departure. Freshman Jeff January saw time behind the plate in Florida, but sophomore Andy Pelis is the probable backup.

Stone said he is pleased with the look of the team right now, even though UMass was picked third behind Temple and St. Joseph's. UMass has a four-game series at Temple this weekend.

Hoop fans standing behind UMass

Students will be tuning in to catch the 'Sweet 16'

By MICHELLE ROBBINS

University of Massachusetts basketball fans say they will be glued to their television screens tonight anxiously anticipating the outcome of the basketball game between UMass and Kentucky.

"I'll be watching the game and partying in Brandywine tonight," said Adam Kirby, a freshman School of Management major.

Kirby said he believes UMass basketball will increase University student enrollment.

"More people will want to come to UMass because we have a winning basketball team," said Kirby.

Amy Martin, a freshman communications major, said she will be watching the game in her dorm tonight.

"I love the enthusiasm of basketball and I get psyched for our team," she said.

Martin said she has gone to UMass basketball games and has followed the team's progress closely.

"I think our team deserves to have made it this far in the NCAA tournament," she said.

Jim Canderozzi, a junior hotel, restaurant and travel administration major, said it is exciting to have the UMass basketball team still in the NCAA Tournament.

"I can brag to people at other schools about the UMass team making it to the 'Sweet 16,'" said Canderozzi, who said he will be watching the game in his house if his cable is turned on by then.

U.S. Rep. John W. Olver of Amherst said he praises the UMass basketball team for their recent victories.

"As a former teacher at UMass, I am particularly proud of our basketball team's accomplishment and the

Banner raised in Amherst to celebrate Minutemen

By JEFF McKENZIE

An Amherst resident seeking to encourage town support for the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team rallied town officials yesterday to raise a banner over Amherst praising the Minutemen for their success in the NCAA tournament.

The banner, which reads, "Amherst Congratulates UMass Basketball," now stretches over North Pleasant St. and was the idea of Amherst resident Mary Jane Copp.

Copp, who felt the need for the town to publicly display its support for the team, phoned town officials after Sunday night's game against Syracuse.

"I think the town should be joyful, celebrating — right now!" Copp said, "Grab the excitement!"

Marie Wickey, assistant to the town manager, coordinated the raising of the banner by involving local businesses such as Twister's Tavern, Rafters Sports Bar and Nathan Agencies, the three of whom co-sponsored the project.

Peter Langlois, general manager of Rafters, said he has never seen as much enthusiasm for a sporting event like this in the past, including the Superbowl.

"This place was filled to capacity an hour before the game on Sunday," Langlois said. "We had an even mix of both students and townspeople."

Athena Exarhopoulos, a UMass senior HRTA major, said she feels the banner reflects the town's overwhelming support for the team's effort.

"It's something for everyone to see," she said.

UM gains town voice

Six students elected to Town Meeting

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

The election of six University of Massachusetts students to the Amherst Town Meeting Tuesday may allow the University's concerns to be more recognized in town politics, several winning candidates said.

"Right now the students have an even stronger voice in the town," said sophomore Matt Pavesi, who was re-elected with five write-in votes for a three-year term as a representative of Precinct 4.

Other UMass students who obtained positions as representatives of Precinct 4 for three-year terms were Ken Kaplan, who won with four votes, sophomore Holly Amenkowicz, who won with 38 votes and Michelle Williams, who also won with four votes.

Junior Jen Wood, who was reelected for a one-year term as representative of Precinct 5 with 109 votes, said because more students are involved in town meeting the relationship between the town and the students will be strengthened.

"Now Amherst and the students can channel their energy into solving problems instead of the town focusing their anger against student lifestyles," said Wood.

Tracy O'Connell, who won a two-year term as a representative of Precinct 9 with 134 votes, said she hopes to share her concerns about student-related issues with the residents of Amherst.

"It will be great to have some young blood in town meeting," said O'Connell.

The newly elected and reelected members of town meeting will join existing members, who have served one year of their three-year terms, Hollie Crowley of Precinct 2, Student Trustee Kevin Newman of Precinct 3, Dennis Crowley of Precinct 4 and Rob Murray of Precinct 4.

Pavesi said there are now 10 students with seats on the town meeting, compared to last year's six students. "This increase gives students more leverage in the town," he said.

UMass faculty criticize higher ed secretary

By CECILIA WONG
Special to the Collegian

After seven months in office as Secretary of Higher Education, Piedad Robinson recently received a vote of "no confidence" from faculty members at UMass/Boston, UMass/Amherst and seven state colleges.

The faculty unions' protest follows months of budget cuts by the Weld administration and the prospect of further losses for next year's budget under level funding.

Robertson was sworn in as Secretary of Higher Education last August at a time of severe budget cuts and organizational changes at every level of public education.

She was the president of Bunker Hill Community College when she was named Education Secretary. The position was created as part of Weld's policy to centralize all levels of public education, from kindergarten to graduate school.

Arthur MacEwan, acting president of the faculty union at UMass/Boston, said there were two reasons for the vote of "no confidence."

First, MacEwan noted what he called Robertson's "explicitly insulting remark" at the January meeting of Higher Education Coordinating Council. In response to the problem of low faculty morale raised by council member Arnold Hiatt, Robertson said, "These words have no proof. The are anecdotal."

"Robertson's remark demonstrates that she is behind the problem," MacEwan said.

Also, there was a feeling that she was the principal person representing Weld's policy in higher education, and not an advocate for the interests of the universities.

However, Undersecretary of Education Andy Gomez, a spokesperson for Robertson, argued otherwise.

"I don't think it was intended on the part of the Secretaty of Education [to belittle the problem]. Besides, what's high or low morale? It's not something easy to define," Gomez said.

Gomez suggested that the real problem lies in the faculty not having received a salary increase in four years.

"Robertson and I have both come from

Weld courts German business

MUNICH, Germany (AP) — Out drumming up business for his home state, Gov. William Weld of Massachusetts met Wednesday with top representatives of car maker BMW and the electronics giant Siemens in Munich.

Weld started a busy day in talks with the head of BMW's technical research and development division, Bernd Pischetsrieder, the governor's press spokesperson Ray Howell said.

"BMW is thinking about opening a new facility somewhere on the eastern seaboard," Howell said, "and the governor was pitching for Massachusetts."

Later Weld met with Siemens Chairperson Horst Langer.

Howell said the two discussed Siemens' current interests in the state, including in Burlington.

"Siemens has plans for expansion in Massachusetts, but they are not yet specific," Howell said.

Following the morning talks, Weld had lunch with U.S. Consul in Munich, Andrew Thoms.

They were joined by Massachusetts Secretary of Economic Affairs Steve Tocco, and Lawrence Fish, chairman of the Governor's Advisory Board on Economic Growth. Several American and German business representatives also attended the lunch.

Afternoon activities included round table discussions with local Munich reporters asking questions on German-American business relations.

During the string of meetings, the companies Kamp-Dresser and McKee and TUV-Munich announced an environmental, engineering and consulting joint-venture plan in Germany, Howell said.

Weld also scheduled an evening reception in the Bavarian state capital, his last stop in Germany after visiting Berlin on Monday and Tuesday. There he opened a state trade office, to expand Massachusetts business in Europe.

Weld's next stop is Paris where he will hold further trade talks with French officials on Thursday and Friday.

Man faces bomb threat hearing

BOSTON (AP) — A Quincy man who said he was the target of a bomb that killed one Boston police officer and injured another last year was scheduled for a rendition hearing Thursday in San Francisco.

Officials said Thomas A. Shay was arrested in California Tuesday on a federal fugitive from justice warrant by agents from the Boston office of the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

"Hopefully, he'll be back [in Massachusetts] on Friday," Shay's attorney, William McPhee of Quincy, said Wednesday.

Shay is alleged to have failed to show up in Boston Municipal Court in January on charges of making a false bomb threat to the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority.

McPhee said Shay has been subpoenaed to testify before a federal grand jury investigating the killing of Officer Jeremiah J. Hurley Jr. and the injuring of his bomb squad partner, Officer Francis X. Foley.

The bomb exploded last October outside the home of Shay's father Thomas L. Shay.

Both the father and son have denied responsibility for the bombing, but the younger Shay told reporters he thought he was the target of the bomb.

McPhee said he did not know why, but the federal grand jury asked the younger Shay to provide photographs, fingerprints and a handwriting sample.

The lawyer said he has not been notified that Shay is a target of the grand jury investigation but was told his client is a subject of the criminal inquiry.

McPhee defined "subject" as "someone they are looking into as a potential target," and added, "I don't believe he will be indicted for the bombing."

A federal grand jury is involved since the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms has jurisdiction because of the bomb, and officials say a federal grand jury has more power to investigate possible suspects than the state system allows.

institutions. Unlike those bureaucrats [faculty and union members], our goal is to stabilize higher education, preventing it from further cuts," Gomez stated.

"I think they [faculty members] are shooting down the Secretary of Education, who was their former friend, and rather than supporting her goal to restore higher education, they made her an enemy," he said.

Gomez further added that higher education has received massive cuts in the past five years, and this is the first year that there have not been cuts in higher education by way of level funding. However, he emphasized that level funding does not include salary increases for faculty, or any other state workers.

MacEwan contended, "Even if the faculty and other state workers are fighting for their salary, it doesn't mean that they're less concerned about the plight of higher education. This is reflected in the hostility towards tuition increases. We along with the students, have continuously campaigned against higher tuition," he added.

According to David Lenson, president of the faculty union at UMass/Amherst, a faculty contract was ratified in December 1990, which was supposed to increase their salary by 13 percent over a two-and-a-half-year period. However, when Weld became the governor, he backed out of the contract, refusing to fund it.

Lenson further added that Robertson is intent on denying the faculty morale problem. "[Robertson and her staff] are millions of miles away from the campuses, and have no idea how things function on a day-to-day basis."

To paint a picture of how bad things have gotten, Lenson said the library at Amherst has not bought a single book since August, and all the periodical subscriptions are threatened to be terminated.

"The faculty has lost 180 people in the last two years and may lose another 60 or 70 due to retirement or deaths," he said.

"The workloads are getting heavier and there's a hiring freeze. We nee to hire some junior professors to rejuvenate this place," he said.

"There people [Robertson and her staff] don't really care what happens to this campus," Lenson said.

According to Lenson, none of the three sectors, namely the universities, the state colleges or the community colleges, have a budget for next year, nothing is concrete.

Level-funding, Lenson explained, "looks good on paper." It does not take into account inflation adjustment, and the proposed level-funded budget is based on 100 percent tuition retention.

Enrollments at the four-year institutions are expected to drop, as birthrates bottomed out in 1976, meaning less tuition for the school.

MacEwan said, "[By voting no confidence in Robertson], it gets in some publicity, in part as a general political effort to fight those policies.

"It also shows that Robertson hasn't done a very good job, because not only does she carry out unpopular policies, she has added personal hostility to public hostility," he added.

Lenson said, "We hope that by doing something provocative, we're going to create some publicity for public debate," adding that the unions are going to lobby the legislature next month.

HRTA class offers Julia Child its best

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

One of America's most venerable culinary artists visited the University of Massachusetts yesterday to experience the gastronomic offerings of a class in "Advanced Food Preparation."

Julia Child, well-known chef and author of The Way To Cook and The French Chef Cookbook, was the guest of the hotel, restaurant and travel administration department and the department of nutrition in the College of Food and Natural Resources at a special luncheon held in the Chenoweth Lab.

"Most of the great moments in history have been spurred on by food," Child said. "I hope to give students encouragement."

Twenty-four other guests were at the luncheon via a lottery held by the nutrition department and HRTA, including department faculty, deans of the departments and administration members.

Tracy Brenessel, a sophomore HRTA major, was one of three students who won the lottery in the department to eat lunch with Julia.

"I didn't think it was going to happen, but all my friends are really excited for me," she said. "And I do know which fork to use, so I'm not worried about that."

Class members of HRTA 367 scurried around the Chenoweth kitchen, preparing the courses which included gazpacho soup, spinach salad with hot bacon dressing, chicken alla romana and raspberry mousse. They worked rapidly, perfecting the presentation while Child toured the kitchen.

"I'm really excited. I can't believe I just talked to her," said Lauren Laidner, a junior HRTA major. "It seems ironic that she's going to be eating my food."

On her tour, Child stopped to talk with senior HRTA major Steve McAfee about his plans after graduation.

"I told her I just hope to get a job in the field," he said.

McAfee declared himself a fan of Child's, but said he wasn't apprehensive about her eating his food.

"It's really just like serving anyone else," McAfee said. "I just hope to put out the best product."

HRTA 367 is the final class in a three-course sequence of food preparation and service for students in the major. The students hone their culinary skills by serving four-course luncheons every Monday and Wednesday at noon for $3.75 each to thirty University faculty members in the Howard Johnson Room in Chenoweth Hall. Monday through Thursday at 4:30, four-course dinners are served as well.

Previous to the luncheon, Child visited HRTA 293, "Alternative Labor Resources," in Skinner Hall. The five-year-old program, designed by Professor Frank P. Lattuca, trains disabled individuals for jobs in the food services industry.

Stockbridge School Director Harry Mosher, a personal friend of Child's who was responsible for her visit, said, "Cookbooks [by Child] were bought for the entire class, and Julia signed every one."

Jeff Ciffolillo, a graduate student and chef instructor in HRTA, was called in for the luncheon to oversee the students' handiwork before it left the kitchen. He was pleased with the students' efforts, and was not nervous about Child's demanding standards.

"I know the food is fantastic," said Ciffolillo, who graduated from the Culinary Institute of America. "I'm not worried a bit."

Habitat for Humanity brings efforts to Pioneer Valley

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

While the volunteer ecumenical Christian organization Habitat for Humanity seeks to eliminate poverty housing worldwide, the organization's Pioneer Valley chapter is working to accomplish this goal locally by building a house in Northampton.

"We are totally non-sectarian in terms of the families who we recruit to live in the house or the groups who help build it," said George Goodwin, president of the Pioneer Valley chapter.

The house, designed by Peter Frothingham of Center Street Architecture of Northampton, is a duplex that will house two families and will give them the opportunity to own their own house.

"Habitat for Humanity is a wonderful organization, and it has made dreams that I never even dared to dream come true," said Northampton resident Kathi Beauregard, one of the new owners.

According to the chapter, Habitat builds and rehabilitates homes with the help of its homeowners through volunteer labor, management expertise and tax deductible donations of money and materials.

After the houses are built they are sold to partner families, and interest-free mortgages are issued over a fixed period.

After the potential homeowners are picked, they are required to put in 500 hours of labor during the construction of the house.

SGA election questions fuel senate debate

By MICHAEL R. LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

A shouting match erupted on the Undergraduate Student Senate floor last night when a senator alleged recent student government elections violated bylaws of the Student Government Constitution.

Baker Senator Stephen Mahoney told the senate a campaign flyer for the winning team of Jennifer Wood, candidate for Student Government President, and Kevin Newnan, candidate for Student Trustee, was posted over the ballot box in Hampshire Dining Commons during elections held on March 10 and 11.

Despite the controversy, election results were eventually approved by a 32 to 1 vote. Fourteen senators abstained.

Mahoney said he believed posting a flyer in such a prominent location may have unfairly biased the final election results.

"The campaign staff would just like to make sure that the elections were run fairly," said Mahoney. "We want the governmental affairs committee to review election policies and make sure things were run fairly before we ratify this election quickly."

Senate Speaker Bob Monaghan said SGA Constitution bylaws required such allegations to be brought before senate officers prior to meetings, and he said Mahoney had neglected to follow proper procedure.

Monaghan quoted the final election results and expressed doubt that a poster could have significantly affected the election. In the race for president, Wood received 1,468 votes to 575 for her opponent Jeffrey Markuns, while present trustee Newnan defeated Sylvan president Christopher Moran by a 1,533 to 605 vote.

Final results from the Hampshire Dining Commons ballot box showed that Wood bested Markuns by a vote of 213 to 25, while Newnan defeated Moran 199 to 31. Thus, as several senators suggested, if the votes from Hampshire were nullified, election results would not have changed significantly.

Monaghan dismissed any suggestions of wrongdoing.

"Even if there was one poster up, I have a hard time believing it made that much of a difference," he said. "This is by far the cleanest election I've seen since I've been here. To bring this up now is ludicrous."

UM program hosts middle school visitors

By DAVID RIVERA
Collegian Staff

With bright eyes and dreams of the future, 250 Springfield middle school students were escorted yesterday around campus in hopes of encouraging them to pursue higher education upon high school graduation.

Students from the Vansickle Middle School in Springfield sampled a taste of UMass life courtesy of the Bilingual Collegiate Program and its new Hispanic Outreach Project.

"Everyone's been really nice to us," said 14-year-old Mariceliz Fuentes. "Now I want to come here."

The project, which hopes to foster interest in higher education among high school students, has been welcomed and received eagerly by BCP staff members as a worthwhile project.

The project, in conjunction with the Springfield School System, provides services to enhance the interest of Hispanic students in higher education.

The program encourages academic competition among Hispanic students. The national drop-out rate of Hispanics is 68 percent, according to BCP statistics.

Vansickle students expressed their pleasure at both the campus facilities and its students. Aside from a campus tour, they were treated to a Dining Common lunch which received rave reviews.

"The food in the cafeteria was great," said Bridgette Smith, 14. "At our school we only get one selection, but you guys get a bunch of stuff."

Alberto Morales, the Springfield coordinator of yesterday's event, said that the project is essentially geared toward making college "real" for students whose parents never attended a university.

"For most of these kids college is something like a mysterious place," Morales said. "This part of the program, which brings kids on campus, helps them understand that they can attain a college education."

Morales said that the program gives tutoring and special counseling and even intervenes in family problems.

"Sometimes we even have to go into families and convince parents about the benefits of college," Morales said.

Morales added that the students were extremely impressed with the campus, and showed great curiosity in the tower library and, because of the men's basketball team, the Curry Hicks Cage.

"Everyone wanted to see the Cage," he said. "But because of time constraints most didn't."

Margarita Gonzalez, a UMass graduate student who teaches at Vansickle, said the project is extremely beneficial for minority students because many young Hispanics lack communication skills.

"If they start early, they can reach their goals," Gonzales said.

Roberto Ortiz, a BCP counselor, had positive views on the program and the direction into which it can steer undecided high school students.

Though the program is for Hispanic students, all students from Vansickle participated.

The organizers wish to continue the project next year, which they hope will eventually increase minority applicants to UMass.

500 hours," said Goodwin.

Beauregard said, "I always wanted to build my own house, and I always thought it would be like a barn raising, where everybody chips in."

Peter and Julie Castillo are the other owners of the duplex. "We have really enjoyed working on it, Peter especially because he has worked as a carpenter," said Julie.

Habitat for Humanity built its 10,000 house last summer in Atlanta, said Goodwin. "We completed one house every hour last year," he said.

The global organization has over 550 affiliated projects in the United States, and more than 100 other projects in other countries.

The Pioneer Valley chapter of Habitat for Humanity began about five years ago, but it has been active for about three years. It has approximately 100 active volunteers, but has a mailing list nearing 1,000.

"We are very grateful and happy about it, and we look at it as God's provision for our family," said Castillo.

"There is a problem with housing. People should have the option of owning their own house, and Habitat for Humanity is a good source for this," said Mike Spanknebel, a senior natural resource studies major.

The Pioneer Valley chapter will be holding an informational meeting tonight at 7 p.m. in room 105 in Holdsworth Hall.

Housing advocates push for $400M bond

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Housing advocates urged lawmakers Wednesday to pass a $400 million bond bill for affordable housing, although the Weld administration is trying to limit the state's long-term debt.

Advocates said the bill would either add or improve up to 8,000 units of housing stock for people with low to moderate incomes. Even if the bond goes forward, the demand for housing will not be met, they told a legislative committee on housing and urban development.

In Boston alone, there are 13,000 families on waiting lists for housing, according to the Massachusetts Affordable Housing Alliance.

But the bill comes at a time when Gov. William Weld is trying to limit the state spending on long-term projects for everything from housing to transportation.

Housing advocates said the state has not issued housing bonds since 1987, and some projects that began with that money now need more to be completed.

Mary Nee, director of Boston's public facilities department, said despite the drop in real estate prices, Massachusetts remains an expensive state to buy a home.

"For most of the commonwealth's homeowners and renters the softening market still means hard times," she said.

The bond measure would fund public housing renovations, housing for people with special needs, elderly housing, lead removal and the purchase of foreclosed properties. Supporters also said the state can use the money to leverage $30 million to $60 million in federal dollars for housing.

Rep. Raymond Jordan (D-Springfield), a co-chairman of the housing committee and a co-sponsor of the bond bill, said the measure will also spur the economy. "Thousands of jobs in the construction trades can be produced through the rehabilitation work that will result from the passage of this bill," Jordan said.

The Executive Office of Communities and Development would oversee the bond money. The agency has a bond cap this year of $60 million set by the administration, and housing advocates said the three-year bond measure would require increasing that cap.

Communities and Development Secretary Mary Padula, who would oversee the bond authorization, said she is working on a housing plan to present to Weld by May. She said her first priority is to protect existing housing stock that needs to be repaired, improved or de-leaded.

"Our intention is to focus on maximizing limited state resources," she said.

Housing advocates were encouraged by Padula's appearance at the committee hearing. But Administration and Finance spokesman Dominic Slowey reiterated the governor's commitment to control spending on capital projects.

"We will take a look at what's in the bond authorization and see if there is any room to do any more for housing," said Slowey.

Slowey said Massachusetts spends more than other states on affordable housing, but housing advocates said the bond still will not meet the need.

Rep. Marie Parents (D-Milford) spoke against the bond measure because she said too much of the money would be spent on administration costs by non-profit organizations.

Some senators, however, insisted the allegations should be investigated. Commuter Area Senator Kevin Jourdain offered to "stay here until midnight every night this week" in order to validate election results.

"Once you ratify this election, you give it your stamp of approval," he said. "Tabling the motion will allow us to clarify all the problems and in this way we can say, 'We're ready — election approved, or election disapproved.'"

When informed by Public Policy Chair Matthew Pavesi that the constitution requires election results to be approved by April 1, Jourdain said the Senate should have been called into emergency session to investigate the charges.

However, because elections were held right before Spring Break, many senators argued that no opportunity existed before last night to address the sudden charges.

Jourdain's delaying tactics angered JQA Senator Kenneth Kaplan, who gave an impassioned speech against "ridiculous party politics."

"There are going to be people who aren't at this University anymore due to the four percent fee increase, and we're fooling around about an election and a poster that's up in an area that doesn't even matter — you could take their votes out and it wouldn't matter," Kaplan shouted. "This is ridiculous, it's aggravating, it's unfair and I'm sickened."

Project Pulse

Student Affairs — University of Massachusetts at Amherst

On Wednesday, October 30, 1991, Project PULSE conducted a telephone survey for the Information Data Bank (IDB), operated by the Dean of Students Office. The survey examined levels of student awareness and use of the IDB. PULSE interviewers attempted to contact 840 students selected randomly from the undergraduate student population, and 430 agreed to be interviewed. The response rate for the survey was 51%.

All of the students sampled, regardless of whether they had heard of or used the IDB, were asked which resource they use most to obtain academic information.

Next, students were asked which resource they use most to obtain non-academic information, such as information about clubs, sporting events, UVC, arts events, etc. (see Figure 2).

Finally, students were asked how the IDB could be effectively advertised (see Figure 3).

More than half (51.1%, n=217) of the students said through the Collegian.

Buchanan in person

The difference between television and real life is a huge one. Americans would do well to remember that, especially during political campaigns.

Case in point: Patrick Buchanan. Before Spring Break I saw the columnist turned renegade candidate on "Nightline" and he delivered his usual slew of political buzzwords and phrases. Take away the cameras and look at Buchanan with your own eyes, however, and the image is significantly uglier.

On TV, Buchanan is a collection of phrases: "quotas," "Liberals," "America First" and my personal fave, "American family values."

Greg Sukiennik

What the hell are those supposed to be? For someone who consistently ridicules George Bush for not defining the "New World Order," Buchanan certainly plays the hypocrite for not telling us flat-out what those values are. Is it because his concept of values is so far removed from ours? If this is a nation of immigrants then which labels fit anyway?

In Pat's little world, how about "White male" for starters? This is a man who, in a mass-mailing which my home was unlucky enough to receive, was not ambivalent at all about his concepts of women's roles in society.

Here, let Pat speak for himself: "Congress, with nary a veto threat from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue, abolished restrictions on women in military combat. Is it any wonder, when it was our justice department that initiated the suit against one of the South's venerated institutions, Virginia Military Institute, for not admitting girls?"

So what should women do? Well, on "Nightline," Buchanan was vehement about a woman's right to raise a family and be a homemaker is she so chose. Okay Pat, I see your point. Women have the right to stay home and be barefoot 'n' pregnant, but they can't go to VMI or fight wars if they want to.

Can you say "double standard?" I thought you could.

On "Nightline," host Chris Wallace kept pestering Buchanan about claims he is a racist, a bigot and an anti-Semite. Buchanan blamed the press and Bush for bringing up dirt he had written in columns years ago.

Oh, I see. Now that Buchanan is a candidate, his bigoted remarks of the past don't count. I suppose we can forget any mistakes ever committed by David Duke, Gary Hart and Bill Clinton (though the jury's still out on that one). By the same logic we can forgive Bush for breaking the "no new taxes" pledge too, right? No one's going to let these guys off the hook. Why should Buchanan get preferential treatment?

Buchanan's "family values" don't include Blacks, either. On "Nightline," Buchanan kept mentioning how violence-ridden Washington D.C. was no longer "the nice town I grew up in." When Wallace pushed Buchanan on the race issue — it is common knowledge that D.C. is predominantly Black — Buchanan cut his losses, blaming "liberal policies" for the problems Washington continues to suffer from.

Read between the lines. The "nice town" Pat Buchanan grew up in was segregated until 1955! It took a Supreme Court case (Bolling v. Sharp for all you PolSci 361 fans) to reverse the shame of a nation which ignored the precepts it was founded on within its' own national capitol.

It was easy enough to see through Buchanan's attack on "quotas" as demagoguery and disregard for civil rights. While trying to deflect criticism for it, he only proved his critics right. Bigots have no place in any office anywhere in this nation.

Not even as a protest vote.

Basketball as 'the light'

John Calipari: state employee. Harper Williams, recipient of state scholarship aid. University of Massachusetts: stepchild of state government, budget slashed 38 percent.

Toss in more scholarships, shake-and-bake with an uptempo offence and take-no-prisoners rebounding, put it all together in the NCAA basketball tournament, and you have the UMass Minutemen, toast of the commonwealth, the best thing to happen to the embattled university system since the boom went bust.

David Nyhan

Saturday's gut-wrenching 77-71 dispatch of the vaunted Orangemen of Syracuse puts UMass in the final 16, the coach on the gold standard, the players on the emotional high of their young lives, and the state university on a pedestal so high it might get a nosebleed. About time.

In no other state is the public higher education system so taken for granted, so pitifully funded, so often denigrated by the shortsighted boobs who sought to save a tax dime by slashing the education dollar.

Because there are eighty-odd private colleges and universities here, with lofty reputations, wealthy alumni and well-oiled connections to Washington and the private sector, the state system of 27 campuses, which educates half the 300,000 plus college students here, is Second-hand Rose.

Runt-of-the-litter no more. The burst for excellence that marks Calipari's 30-and-4 basketball team energizes the students, heartens the university's backers on Beacon Hill, and makes the rest of the state take a fresh look at the Amherst-based flagship of the imperiled university system.

Sportscasting being what it is, hyperbole is the stock in a trade that never stops trading. "The biggest story since Paul Revere for Massachusetts," gushed the CBS colorman after Sunday's nationally televised victory.

"They just kept throwing knockout blows, knockout blows," marveled the gallant Jim McCoy later at the opposition. The mighty Orangemen, who play in a gym at home, the Carrierdome, that seats four times as many people as the Boston Garden, kept lobbying haymakers, and the shorter UMass squad kept throwing leather in return.

McCoy, who iced six-of-six overtime free throws, summarized the lesson in life of Sunday's exercise: "I think we learned never to give up."

Exactly. The kids who never gave up, from the school and the system that's been hammered by budget cuts, legislative indifference and outright gubernatorial hostility going back four years. For four years, state employees everywhere, not just at UMass, have gone without any pay raises.

Their budgets were cut. Their paychecks sank, from inflation and from hiked medical insurance premiums. Worst of all, they were vilified by cheap-shot artists in the media and in the political game. The bottom line: if you worked for the state, if you went to a state school, you were a hack, a bum, you couldn't make it, get lost, you loser, get a life.

"We've always had to fight harder than anybody else," was the hoarse post-game comment of Dan Melley, a UMass vice chancellor. "That's the way it is here. After four years of losing battles, of 10 budget cuts, now the whole state is suddenly behind us. The secretaries are wearing UMass T-shirts to work. Our alumni had pride in the school but didn't have any way to express it till now. I sense that's changed."

When UMass taps off against Kentucky tonight in Philadelphia, David Bartley will be there. He played on the 17-and-6 Minuteman club of 1955-'56. He was the first UMass grad, "not from the hay-and-grain school," to serve in the Legislature, rising to become speaker, before resigning to head Holyoke Community College.

"If I was running UMass, I'd get a thousand tickets for Philadelphia, invite every legislator, the governor, that damned State House press corps. I'd take 'em down to show how UMass can escel not only in basketball but in being a university."

Bartley sees a breakthrough for the school spearheaded by Coach Calipari. Bartley introduced me to Calipari at a UMass football game when the rookie basketball mentor looked like a high school waterboy. "I was on the committee that picked him; this kid is gonna be a superstar!" Bartley gushed that day.

What Calipari has done with unheralded players he molded into a confident, swashbuckling, attacking kind of team could be done across the board in Amherst. "But we're losing our superstars," fumed Bartley. "The engineering dean who's gone out to Michigan, the history and economic professors, the polymer science guys who've all left because they've not been supported, the football coach who just quit."

If the state gets behind UMass again, "we'd be in the Final Four for polymer science, the Final Two for economic development, and given the resources, we'd be No. 1 in brainpower," with 180,000 students churning through the public system.

He spoke for all the UMass kids who landed a degree from the Rodney Dangerfield colossus of Amherst: "If it weren't for UMass, I'd be running a machine on the third floor of a factory in Holyoke, or I'd be on unemployment." Not now. Not ever.

And tonight, UMass and season-ticket holder Bartley are going to The Show.

The glory in rejection

It's that time of year again. Students all over campus are setting themselves up for either major accomplishments or big-time rejections in their college careers. I, for one, have just received my first rejection of the season. Ironically enough, this is not my first time on "Rejection Row."

Getting my hopes up about something I've applied for, only to watch it disintegrate before my eyes, is not my idea of fun.

The first time I remember this happening, I was ten years old. Returning from winter break with my family, I discovered I had not been chosen as an all-star for the girl's basketball league.

Felice Cohen

Well, to a ten-year-old, this was the end of the world. I thought my basketball career was over for sure. My parents told me not to worry. They said, "It may be hard to understand now" but promised "bigger and better things will come out of this." I didn't believe them.

Eight years, seven varsity letters and three captain pins later at a banquet honoring high school athletes from New England, I was receiving one of the highest awards of the day. Standing at the podium, looking out at my parents, I told the story of that dreadful day back when I was ten. It was at that moment I realized what my parents soothing words had meant.

At the end of my junior year of high school, after having been vice-president of my class for three years, I decided to run for class president. I wound up losing to one of the most popular boys in school. I felt terrible, but a friend's note to me, which read, "You never fail unless you fail to try," gave me insight into what it really means to get rejected.

After losing the election, my dad explained that, "When you win, the thrilling feeling of the victory is because you don't have to face the agony of the defeat when you lose. Losing helps you grow inside and helps you to become a better person all around." Though at first it may be hard to believe.

This is the season when students all over campus open their mailboxes with a little extra anxiety. Waiting to be ripped open are either the long-awaited, "Congratulations, you've been selected to..." or the inevitable, "I'm sorry to inform you the position has been filled..." letters. But whatever the outcome, with the correct outlook on what it means to be rejected, you can still come out a winner.

So you didn't receive the Resident Assistant position or a job with some huge company or the chance to speak at your college graduation. Just the fact you had enough self-confidence in yourself to try is a hundred times better than never having tried at all.

Tonight's UMass/Kentucky game is the perfect example. Remember the beginning of the season when UMass lost two Atlantic Ten games? People had begun to dispel the possibility of the team accomplishing anything.

Well, look how far they've come. They could easily have given up, but instead persevered. And now the NCAA Sweet Sixteen is no longer a dream, but a reality. Despite the outcome, they're all winners in my book.

Of course, not setting yourself up for rejection is the safest route, but is it really rewarding? Sure, never trying anything keeps you from feeling rejection, but it also keeps you from reaching your goals.

Breaking through obstacles is needed in order to grow. It is similar to getting your body in good physical condition. At first it hurts breaking in the new muscles, but eventually you get over the pain. When that happens, you are able to continue, but on a higher level.

The next time you are rejected, look at all the people who never even tried. That is when you'll know you've already won.

RAs need a new job description and economic justice

The dust has finally settled and graduate assistants now have a powerful union and a contract to protect their interests. But there is another group of heavily exploited student workers on this campus who also need economic justice: undergraduate RAs.

I speak from the tired voice of experience, having spent three semesters as an RA in Central. Resident assistants are underpaid, overworked, and given conflicting duties that cause enormous amounts of stress and burn-out. Some radical changes are needed to achieve fairness. There are several major problems:

First of all, RAs should not be asked to card residents in order to enforce underage drinking laws. If RAs are expected to act like cops, they should be trained and paid like cops.

When RAs card residents, sometimes they place themselves in endangering situations. Although they're expected to get ID numbers and check ages, they are not trained in self-defense and hostilities sometimes errupt in situations involving alcohol.

When RAs have to act like cops, it destroys the RA-peer relationship. Resentment and hatred builds up between residents and the staff and prevents RAs from doing the most rewarding part of their job — social/educational programming and counseling.

Another problem is the underlying reason why students become RAs — many need to work in exchange for a room. Housing takes full advantage of this economic dependency, heaping the RA position with job mandates. These include requiring RAs to return a week early each semester to get the dorms ready and undergo training for about twelve hours a day without pay.

Also, RAs are required to take a three-credit training class taught by Resident Directors (their bosses), that is considered part of their academic course load. The class meets once a week for three hours and attendance is mandatory for new RAs. They must pass the course to keep their jobs.

Trystan Skeigh

It is blatantly unfair to link RA training with their student academic standing. It smacks of blackmail. Also, the RA class raises another issue of economic fairness: Because it's treated as an academic class, it's included on the student bill — so RAs actually have to pay for those three credit hours, although the RA training class doesn't fulfill any GenEd requirements.

RA responsibilities are legion. They must be experts on social diversity, capable counselors able to spot drug addictions, unhealthy relationships and sexuality issues, they must document residents (read: peers) who violate Housing regulations, take disciplinary problems to student judiciary hearings and argue like lawyers, monitor the physical conditions of their buildings and arrange for repairs, and support state laws on underage drinking and illegal drug use.

All this on top of their "estimated 20-hour a week part-time commitment" that includes updating bulletin boards daily, organizing weekly programs, attending weekly RA speciality matters meetings, and spend several evenings a week on cluster office duty. Ask any RA and they'll tell you they actually spend 40-80 hours a week doing their jobs.

In return for all this, RAs receive a $26.88 weekly "stipend" and a room, unless they work in Sylvan area. Because those RAs have larger floors, they receive a whopping ten dollars more.

Keeping in mind RAs are only allowed to take one weekend off campus a month, when one compares their actual working hours with their tiny stipend and the cost of their room, one discovers RAs actually earn a few pennies an hour.

Because their stipend obviously is not enough to pay for food, books, laundry, and other necessities, many RAs have to hold a second job. This becomes difficult because the cost of an RAs room is deducted from their allotted work-study hours by Financial Aid. As we all know, non-work study jobs are hard to find.

Working a second job adds to an RA's exhaustion and reduces their presence on their floors. And it's not necessary to go into lengthy detail about how and why most RAs' grades plummet — the reasons are painfully clear.

Until radical changes are made, a lot of RAs will keep burning out, flunking out and dropping out, and Housing will continue to grind through financially vulnerable undergraduates on this campus. RAs need a new job description and economic justice. It's time we began a campus-wide, open discussion of this problem.

How the public budget deficit halts private business investment

As you were brushing your teeth this morning, you probably asked yourself, "How does the public budget deficit inhibit private business investment?" Simple. The more the government borrows, the less money is available from lenders to be invested in business growth.

According to economic writer Jonathan Rauch, the annual federal deficit currently equals about one-third of the national savings pool available for investment, so this effect is hardly trivial. Also, the more the government must borrow, the higher the interest rates the government must offer to pay.

To compete with the government for investment funds, businesses must offer similarly high rates of return, and many businesses find this infeasible. The result is reduced business investment, a primary cause of the stagnation in personal income growth that has plagued the United States for two decades.

Won't the "peace dividend" and "increasing efficiently by eliminating waste" cover the deficit? Even a doubling of currently proposed defense cuts, a ten percent reduction in government administrative costs, and an end to federal funding of most silly programs like the Lawrence Welk Museum — none of which are likely to occur — would not save more than about $100 billion. Meanwhile, the deficit for next year's federal budget will be about $400 billion.

Renucing the federal deficit will require raising taxes on the rich. Can they afford this?

As reported in a recent article by Robert McIntyre of Citizens for Tax Justice, the annual inflation-adjusted income of the richest 1 percent of the population more than doubled in the last fifteen years, from an average of $315,000 to $676,000. Over the same time period, this group's taxes were cut by 30 percent, a windfall which this year will average over $83,000 per family!

As for the rest of us, about 60 percent saw our average income fall and 75 percent saw our federal taxes rise. McIntyre shows that if tax rates had simply remained as progressive as they were in the mid-1970s, the additional tax revenue from just the wealthiest 1 percent would cover about half of this year's budget deficit.

The deficit reduces business investment and personal income growth, alters currency exchange rates so as to hurt exports and favor imports, and increases the tax burden for future years.

Just the interest payments on the federal debt now exceed federal spending on education, health, transportation, natural resources, energy, agriculture, science, space, and technology combined, as reported by economics writer James K. Glassman.

In short, federal debt is one of the biggest impediments to national progress. Nevertheless, many presidential candidates and Congressional leaders are advocating policies that would increase the deficit and reduce taxes on the rich. American voters must demand that these trends be reversed.

Jewish alcoholics and junkies

Jews in America have a serious drug and alcohol problem. It's time to face facts. Fact: studies of college drug users consistently find a significantly higher use rate among Jews. Fact: some studies have projected that 15 percent of the alcoholic drug user community is Jewish. I learned some of these shocking facts when Rabbi Abraham Twerski recently spoke in the area. No longer can we say "not in my synagogue," "not in my family."

I am a Jewish American. My experiences have shown me that American Jews are in no way exempted from any of the many addictions so common in the instant gratification society of America. The list includes alcoholism, drug addiction, compulsive overeating and compulsive gambling, among others.

When I saw Rabbi Abraham Twerski speak on Jews and addiction, a woman stood up to introduce him: "My name is Sarah [not her real name] and I'm an addict. I used and abused drugs for most of 18 years. I was told that this didn't happen in Jewish families. Well, I'm here to say that it does happen." Today she is six years sober.

She had the incredible courage it took to confront Jewish denial not only in her family but in front of a synagogue filled with 350 people. The only way to address these addictions in the Jewish community is to talk about them openly, as she did.

The answer to our problem is not to cover it up. Addictions all thrive on secrecy. By continuing to deny the problem and to shelter our friends and relatives from the consequences of our actions, we guarantee the growth of addictions.

All right, so we need to confront Jewish addiction, but how? Rabbi Twerski has great insight into how. We need to look at the habits, drinking, drugging, etc., of ourselves and our families. Jewish counselors and Rabbis need to be taught about Jewish addicts. Most importantly, we need to increase the number of twelve-step Alcoholics Anonymous based meetings in local synagogues and temples. Holding all such meetings in churches will only perpetuate the myth that Jews are exempted from addictions. There was recently a group discussing this at the Jewish Community of Amherst. Interested people on campus should talk to the Rabbi there.

What I have learned recently is shocking but I also have great hope that we can confront this successfully. I witnessed a beautiful beginning when I saw Rabbi Twerski. Now we can begin working together to confront our secret tragedy.

Another installment of Notes from the Campus Center

I used to think I was just about as cause-conscious as I could be. I am a STPEC major. I've got a 16 x 20 poster of Abbie Hoffman and I wear tee-shirts with snappy slogans about complex social and political ills. I'm a member of the UMass Outing Club.

I was listening to that 28 minute version of "Dark Star" from Colorado in '72 when it struck me — there simply is no justifiable excuse for consciously taking the life of a fellow organism. All these hydroponically grown foodstuffs I had been eating were unfairly exploitative of plants. For years, I had been waging a one-man genocidal war against chick peas and mixed grains. This weeks exercise in moralistic, self-righteous faux-alturism: VEGETABLE RIGHTS.

For thousands of years, we, as a race, have raised plants for the reaper, as if it were our natural right. Should they die by the thousands to satisfy our insatiable primal urges?

Since my decision, I have eaten only dirt, minerals, sugar-free Skittles, non-dairy creamer and other non-exploitative foodstuffs.

I've contracted scurvy, but a chemistry-educated friend of mine is working to manufacture ascorbic acid (Vitamin C) in test tubes down in Goessman.

I soon realized that my wardrobe was just as unfriendly to plant-life as my diet. I mothballed my cotton-based apparel next to my old Birkenstocks and suede jacket. From now on, nothing but Rayon and polyester for me. All this is taking a toll on my lifestyle, and dental work, but I feel much better about myself.

While I was home for spring break, my 11 year-old sister mentioned that her school had started drug education. I asked what she was learning, imagining after school specials about the quarterback and homecoming queen strung out on dope, dying in a spectacular "Chips"-style wipe-out the night of the senior prom.

Josh Reynolds

As a visual aid, picture an entire classroom of sixth-graders strapped into chairs for Clockwork Orange-style classical conditioning on the evils of marijuana. All made possible by a grant from the Anheuser-Busch foundation.

Instead, she told me they learned all about "Y'know, pills 'n stuff. . . uppers and downers." I'm sure they covered all the important ones, like red devils, yellow jackets, green clovers, purple horsehoes and blue diamonds.

I used to think "Just say no" was out of touch. I'll bet I couldn't find crack in my hometown if I tried. (Incidentally, our address down here is 113 Campus Center Basement.) I wonder if they still do duck-and-cover nuke drills, too.

I saw Brazil over break. Brazil did poorly in the theaters, and was sold to UMass as an instructional video for Whitmore/Health Services employees. I'm waiting for a rogue Ericsson telecommunications engineer to crash through the window and tell me why the "message received" light on my phone won't stop blinking.

Honestly, I couldn't be happier for the Minutemen. They've certainly demonstrated that for a bunch of guys with hyperactive pituitary glands, they've got admirable hand-eye coordination. But, I couldn't help wondering what the excitement that this causes says about our priorities.

Our school can raise that money for a new stadium, but can't find the cash to patch steam lines, or fix leaking roofs in academic buildings that are already standing.

Students pay a higher athletic fee than library fee. If it came right down to it, which would you rather be without?

Perhaps the University is suffering from an identity crisis as much as a financial one. This school should redefine itself as an institute of higher athletics, which just happens to have some great varsity academics.

I know that academics don't really serve the fundamental needs of a higher athletics institution, but they sure are a great way to attract alumni contributions and prospective athletes.

That's all for now kids, enjoy your weekend, don't trip over the residents while taking that short-cut home (they've developed a habit of hiding in the bushes, that seems derived from either a Current Affair or Marlin Perkins.) Remember: don't let your homework get in the way of your phys. ed. In these hard times, we may be forced to go without, but don't worry, all sports will continue as scheduled.

gave her three pilot episodes, which recieved a great response. The program was then given a 13-series contract.

"All of these shows were in black and white," she said. "It wasn't until after the 119th episode that we had color. The station had two cameras — one black and white and the other color. So I'd be cooking, making a strawberry tart, and half a minute would be in color and the other half in black and white."

Child said her interest in food began when she was young, but her interest in gourmet food began after she started working for the Office of Strategic Services, the precursor to the present Central Intelligence Agency.

"When I was young, we ate simple food," said the native of Pasadena, Calif. "It was well-done lamb with fruit jelly and that sort of thing."

"In the early 40s, I was sent to China [while working for the OSS]. The food there was the best I've ever had — better than any Chinese restaurant I've ever eaten in.

"I was with sophisticated people who would talk about the great food they had eaten in Paris and other places," she said, mentioning when there was a medical epidemic, they had to rely on Army rations they were given.

"These usually consisted of canned tomatoes, potatoes and water buffalo," she said with a hint of sarcasm. "This is when the talk of really good food began."

Child said after World War II, she and her new husband Paul, now involved with the U.S. Information Agency, were assigned to Paris, which she calls the turning point in her life.

Recalling her first meal in a Paris restaurant, she said she was amazed with the filet of sole, which was cooked in a wine and mushroom sauce.

"It was a revelation to me that someone could do such things with food," she said, noting fish meals in her own home consisted of broiled mackerel.

She said although she had taken French all throughout her schooling, she was lost in Paris because of the dialectical difference. However, in 1948 she entered the Cordon Bleu Cooking School.

"I had never really found my niche in life," she said.

She said the classical French cooking she learned was not the typical thing for the people involved with the diplomatic corps to take interest in.

"Most of the embassy wives had maids, and no middle-class women were in the field," she said.

She met two women involved with the cooking school, and learned they were collaborating on a book about French cooking, which they hoped to sell in the United States. They had another collaborator, a man in New York who would translate the recipes into English as well as give direction about American tastes.

"I was upset when I learned about their book, because it was something I would have been extremely interested in," she said. "Soon after, the man died. I can't say I was upset."

She said she did the English collaboration, but the book, Mastering the Art of French Cooking, did not come out for another nine years. In the meantime, she and her friends began teaching American tourists about French food.

"Some friends were visiting and said they wanted to learn about French food, but they didn't know any French," she said. "One of my friends said 'We'll teach you.' This became the School of the Three Healthy Eaters."

Child said French cuisine has always been somewhat foreign to Americans because until the advent of the airplane the only people who traveled to Europe did so on oceanliners.

Fire officials deter tampering

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

Campus officials are putting out a message to deter students from vandalizing fire equipment that is located on campus.

Collegian photo by Josh Reynolds

UMass fire prevention officer James Field displays damaged fire extinguishers.

"The next time you decide to "play" with a fire extinguisher in your residence hall, think again," says David J. Beaudin, associate fire prevention officer. "It could cost you up to $1000."

Discharging a fire extinguisher may seem relatively harmless, but if a fire started in your residence hall there is a chance you could find it empty or damaged.

"Because extinguishers have been treated as "toys," there is no guarantee that the extinguisher will be available when needed," said James Field, a fire prevention officer.

"In one residence hall alone, the cost to refill and replace fire extinguishers is $400 per week," said Field.

"If this figure was multiplied by the 41 residence halls the cost for servicing and replacement of extinguishers could exceed $200,000 per year," he said.

Field said that his office will be requesting that legal action be taken against people who commit the following criminal acts:

- 1) Tampering with or discharging fire extinguishers. These items are installed and maintained by law. Anyone found tampering with them will be prosecuted.
- 2) Throwing loaded fire extinguishers (or any other item) from open windows, exhibiting disregard for the health and safety of people who live in your building or may be passing underneath. This will lead to prosecution.
- 3) Tampering with or disabling a fire alarm system, which is a violation of state law. Disabling the fire alarm speakers in dorm rooms disrupts more than one part of the system. This could jeopardize the health and safety of the entire floor.

Field said all these behaviors share a common underlying theme: total lack of respect for fellow residents, for the community and for the property they all share.

"It's clear that vandalism is expensive and everyone in the residential system ultimately pays in the form of higher housing costs," he said.

Pavesi said he wanted to get a polling place on campus to make it easier for students to cast their votes. "This would greatly help the student voter turnout," he said.

He said because of the stronger student voice in town meeting he believes student representatives can convince the Amherst citizen members to help students fight for the funding of off-campus housing and other issues.

"Amherst can lobby the administration into getting more funds but they sit on their butts most of the time," said Pavesi.

UMass students Jon Aronson, a sophomore, and junior Marjorie Decker lost the election for representative of Precinct 3 to Amherst citizens. Junior Dave Anderson, who ran for representative of Precinct 6, also lost the election to a town citizen.

STDs decline, but teenagers still in danger

BOSTON (AP) — Sexually transmitted diseases rates dropped in Massachusetts last year for the first time in five years, but remained high for minority teen-agers, public health officials say.

State public health officials attributed the overall drop partly to improved surveillance and an adolescent health campaign that includes making condoms available in some communities.

Some of the decline may be the result of an apparently natural cycling in rates that cannot be explained fully, officials said.

Assistant Public Health Commissioner Alfred DeMaria announced the statistics Tuesday to the Public Health Council, the policy-making arm of the state Department of Health.

"After five years of progressive increase in STD rates in Massachusetts, last year saw a decline in the indicator diseases of syphilis, gonorrhea and chlamydia," he said.

But rates remain high for teen-agers, especially minority youths, he said — "The disparity is clearly there."

The rate of syphilis among blacks aged 15 to 19 increased from 166.8 for every 100,000 in 1990 to 182 per 100,000 last year.

Among whites in the same age group, the rate dropped from 3.3 per 100,000 to 1.6.

Among Hispanic teenagers, the rate dropped from 218.2 per 100,000 in 1990 to 137.1 last year, but officials warned the figure may be distorted because the definition of Hispanic has changed.

Public Health Commissioner David Mulligan called on cities and towns to confront the issue of sexually active adolescents who do not help protect themselves with condoms.

He said surveys show that more than half of the high school students in the state are sexually active but only 12 communities take advantage of a state adolescent program that encourages abstinence but makes condoms available.

"I don't think we can put our heads in the sand,"

Zoology class for the birds, in a good way

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Correspondent

Tweet. Tweet. Was that a swallow or a tufted tidmouse? The students in Avian Field Studies know.

Zoology 263 gets students up and moving early in the morning to study birds in their habitat.

During field trips, the class spots birds and listens for their calls. From these "visual-verbal" signals and a bit of help from Professor William B. Nutting, the students identify the species of the birds.

Everyone takes notes of all they see and hear on the trips. Later, they transcribe the information, along with drawings of the birds into field journals which they keep for the class.

The students take trips to places like the Arcadia Audubon Sanctuary, Mt. Toby, Quabbin Reservior and the Connecticut River. Many spontaneous stops are made along the way, as birds are spotted from the van window.

"Once we were driving down the highway and someone shouted, 'Hawk!'" remembers one student. "We tried to stop to get a look, and almost caused an accident. But it was gone."

The class was created by Professor Nutting about 12 years ago. Nutting said, "the course emphasizes a procedural way [of identifying birds] that will be useful anywhere in the world."

According to Nutting, students predict the types of birds they will find in an area by taking into account the humidity, wind direction, cloud cover and precipitation.

The students say they enjoy the experience. Michelle Donahue, who is taking the course "just for fun," said, "It's given me more of an appreciation for nature."

Karen Wagner, an exchange student from Germany, says, "I wanted to know more about the birds in this area. This course is really helpful."

Armed with binoculars and their "looker-upper" (a bird identification book), the students have spotted such birds as the Turkey Vulture, Hooded Merganser and Bald Eagle. A telescope mounted on a tripod helps them get a closer view of the birds' activities.

Student Jonathan Gottsche says, "I find the behavior of birds interesting. What is it doing? What does it mean? Those are the questions I ask now. I used to just ask, 'What is it?'"

The course is offered every spring semester.

Terms of office limited

Proposed amendment caps reelection

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Democratic Rep. Richard Moore has been in the Massachusetts House too long — or so some of his colleagues told him on Wednesday. With all due respect, of course.

But the eight-term legislator held his own in a battle against voter anger, in the form of a proposed constitutional amendment that would limit the number of terms an elected official can serve.

"I don't think you should tell my people whether I should be re-elected or not," Moore, of Uxbridge, told the amendment's supporters.

An organization called Limits on Incumbent Politicians gathered some 72,000 signatures last year for an amendment limiting state constitutional officers, U.S. Congress members and state legislators to no more than eight consecutive years in office. U.S. senators would be held to 12 consecutive years.

To get the question before the voters on the 1993 ballot, the amendment must be approved by at least 50 legislators at two consecutive constitutional conventions.

Gov. William Weld, Lt. Gov. Paul Celucci and Treasurer Joseph Malone — all Republicans — support the amendment, along with Secretary of State Michael Connolly, a Democrat.

One of the amendment's most vigorous supporters, freshman Rep. David Lionett (R-Worcester) called Moore to the mat on what he termed "the stale corridors of government."

"If this petition is not successful in this body, the reason will be obvious — the majority of elected officials put their own re-election interests ahead of the public," said Lionett, who plans to run for Congress.

His remarks were aimed at Moore, who co-chairs the Legislature's Elections Committee. Lionett ended one anti-incumbent diatribe with: "Don't take this personally, Mr. Chairman."

Lionett and Malone testified that voter unhappiness with government stemmed from entrenched politicians more concerned about staying in office than creating policy.

"Give the people of Massachusetts the opportunity to vote on this issue. The people of Massachusetts are smart enough to weigh the pros and cons," said Malone, who succeeded Democrat Robert Crane, who stepped down after 27 years as treasurer.

"You see term limitations as suicides," Malone told Moore.

Moore countered that most of the amendment's backers were Republicans, proof that "the party long out of power" wanted to "change the rules."

On March 10, the U.S. Supreme Court allowed California to limit the terms of state legislators, ruling that the limits, adopted in a 1990 voter initiative, do not violate the constitutional rights of any legislator or voter.

Colorado and Oklahoma voters also passed limits on legislative terms in 1990. The Colorado measure includes limits on how long someone may serve in Congress. Term limits for executive and legislative offices, including members of Congress, will be on the Florida ballot in November.

The Return of the Soul DE LA SOUL

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

They're back . . . after doing a show at Pearl Street in Northampton last semester. The funky trio of De La Soul returns to University of Massachusetts on Sunday, March 29.

If you don't know about the Soul, they broke big in 1989 with their debut album 3 Feet High And Rising. Group members Posdnuos (lyricist), Trugoy the Dove (lyricist), and Baby Huey Maseo (DJ) represented a fresh change from the monotonous rap of the late 1980's. And for a good time read Trugoy backwards to find out his favorite food.

Instead of rhyming about 'sucker MC's' (rap lingo for inadequate rappers) with huge background beats, De La Soul rhymed about humorous topics with daringly different samples accompanying the back-up beats.

The single "Me, Myself, and I" brought some mainstream success with its' catchy hooks and funny storyline. The songs' video showcased De La Soul's humorous.

Other songs which helped 3 Feet High eventually turn platinum include "Buddy" and "Potholes In My Lawn". Producer Prince Paul (member of the rap group Stetsasonic) had to be pleased with the success the album found.

However with that success also came criticism. De La Soul found itself under fire for its heavy use of samples in 3 Feet High. Eventually, a lawsuit about one of the samples was settled out of court for an undisclosed amount of cash-ola.

It is at this point when the Soul went to work on their follow-up album De La Soul is Dead. This album showed a change in the style of De La Soul as the title would suggest.

De La Soul is Dead continues to astonish on the sampling tip as 3 Feet High And Rising did. However, the beats on the album are often slower and topics often more serious than on the group's debut album.

Members of the group apparently didn't like their image as hippy or daisy age rappers, and this dislike is apparent in their sophomore album.

This change in substance for De La Soul certainly hasn't hampered the group's success. Songs on De La Soul is Dead such as the opening single "Ring Ring Ring(Ha Ha Hey),", and "A Roller Skating Jam named 'Saturdays'" have given De La's latest creation an impressive audience.

Both De La Soul albums are put out by the respected hip hop label Tommy Boy Records. Tommy Boy has been one of the longest standing rap labels on the market (since 1982), and Queen Latifah and Naughty By Nature are just some of the big rap groups rhyming under the TB label.

On Sunday, De La Soul will show Amherst why they are one of those big rap groups. If you want to see what should be an entertaining show filled with samples and witty rhymes, check out De La Soul and listen closely.

De La will be playing at the Student Union Ballroom with Original Flavor and Future Sound opening up. Tickets for non-students are $10.00 while students have to pay a mere $8.00.

'Basic Instinct' over-hyped

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Explicit sex, gory violence, bisexual ice-pick killers, excessive nudity: Basic Instinct has all the ingredients of a huge hit. This is not by accident, however, for everything from its expertly choreographed controversy, to the ensuing protests by gay groups to the threatened NC-17 rating, Basic Instinct is a supremely clever example of slick Hollywood commercialism at its apex. It is the only reason for the popularity of this blatantly manipulative, over-hyped thriller from director Peter Verhoeven (Total Recall).

Basic Instinct makes it no secret that it's playing the audience like a violin. Michael Douglas plays a volatile police detective, Nick Curran, who falls for beautiful millionaire novelist Catherine Trammel (Sharon Stone), who is suspected of ice-picking a retired rock star she was sleeping with — just like it happened in her latest bestseller.

Powerful and sexy, Catherine plays elaborate mind games with people, and it's no wonder Nick is attracted to her — the book she's currently writing is all "about a detective who falls for the wrong woman." Catherine shows her preference for no underwear at an interrogation with a mocking, devious smile.

A bisexual with an attitude, her girlfriend Roxy (Leilani Sarelii) is a suspect as well. Jeanne Tripplehorn plays a police psychiatrist who complicates things by having an affair (read: rough sex) with Nick.

Basic Instinct takes its pleasure in arousing, tricking and teasing the audience. The mystery takes a back seat to the stars' sex scenes, which are filled with a staged raw intensity. Their lack of passion is made up with more nudity and physical roughness.

The film presents evidence to the killer's identity in a cheating way; everything comes down to the final frame. Take it away and you've got a different killer. What comes before is strangely reminiscent of an oversexed Jagged Edge, which is no coincidence since they share the same writer (Joe Eszterhas). But all of this is easily overlooked because Basic Instinct is so intriguingly engrossing; a seductive, unrelenting guilty pleasure.

In Shining Through, Michael Douglas proved he could play a true blue hero. Here he plays an ex-coke head nicknamed "Shooter" because he was accused of killing two innocent tourists while allegedly on cocaine. Douglas carefully teeters between coolly aggressive (while trying to play Catherine's game) and downright stupid (trying to play Catherine's game in the first place).

Viper Catherine Tramell is played by Sharon Stone (Total Recall) with a nasty, malevolent flair. Stone wisely chooses not to chew scenery, instead reciting the pulpy dialogue with an almost facetious twist.

Douglas and Stone share a charged, uneasy chemistry. Sparks as well as clothes fly (off) in their tediously steamy, prolonged love scene (four minutes total — after it was trimmed to avoid the NC-17 rating). But the most startling "love" scene comes when Douglas and Tripplehorn get together early in the film. it's the only moment in Basic Instinct that seems to elicit real emotion instead of overblown erotic theatrics.

Various gay and women's groups have protested the film's negative treatment of women and lesbianism, going as far as revealing the ending on posters and billboards. Stone responds: "Does my character give lesbians a bad name? Did Roxanne give firemen a bad name?" You're right Sharon, but since when are firemen persecuted? Despite claims that 'its only a movie,' the groups' complaints are strongly justified.

Out of the only four female characters in Basic Instinct, all of them are either lesbian or bisexual and/or psychotic or dangerous. The relationship between Stone and Sarelli is more a result of a projected male fantasy than a true lesbian coupling. Lesbianism and female bisexuality are treated as either a kinky sex act or a pathological perversion. Not that Basic Instinct even dares to go that deep, for lesbianism and bisexuality are reduced to a convenient plot contrivance.

Basic Instinct is, at its very shallow core, a soft-porn thriller that pushes our buttons enough to keep us watching. Boasting slick production values, a booming musical score and intrepid performances, Basic Instinct is trashy entertainment at its best (or worst). It panders to the audience everything that sells today in our society: nudity, sex and violence. And it does it very well.

New flick causes trouble

I'm beginning to realize that some people really don't know how to make other people understand where they're coming from.

Take, for example, the recent fervor over Basic Instinct, the new Michael Douglas/Sharon Stone movie. It seems some members of the lesbian, bisexual and gay community feel that the portrayal of members of said community in the context of the film is both filthy and stereotypical. And, of course, these people are protesting.

Chris Shadoian

Fine. I agree with them completely. When one feels he or she has been wronged, either physically or emotionally, because what he or she believes in has been made fun of or portrayed falsely, then that should be made known to the general public. It is absolutely necessary to fight for what one believes if one ever wants to end persecution and harassment — especially if it involves the kind of persecution lesbians, bisexuals and gays have received over the years.

But annoying people is not the way to make people understand a point of view.

You see, thanks to the the protests, or rather the method of protest, over Basic Instinct, I knew a crucial element of the film before I ever stepped into the theater (I won't reveal it here, don't worry).

What the gay community is doing to protest Instinct is revealing this secret to moviegoers either while they are standing in line for tickets or during the course of the movie. Protesters are also wearing buttons which say "Blah blah blah," giving away the secret.

If there is one thing I hate more than anything, it's knowing things about movies I haven't seen yet. Just ask my friends. I don't even like to see a preview too many times — I figured out the ending of The Hand That Rocks the Cradle that way.

Needless to say, it didn't exactly please me to know one of Instinct's essential secrets before the fact. Actually, it really annoyed me. I had been looking forward to this movie for quite a while, because good psycho-sexual thrillers are a rarity; and although knowing a major plot twist didn't ruin the whole film (best car chase scenes in a long time), it certainly took away a great deal of the tension and excitement.

However, I am not trying to bash the lesbian, bisexual, gay community or its cause. Not at all. That is the way they are, and the way they want to be, and they have every right to fight for it.

Revealing major elements to people just before they see the movie is not the way to do it, though, and there are couple reasons why.

Number one, all you're going to do is make people mad. They aren't going to want to listen to what you have to say, and might even try to retaliate, depending on how they may already feel about the cause you're trying to advance.

Two, the general public did not make the movie. True, public attitude and stereotypes about the gay community are indirectly responsible for the film's portrayal, but the production was entirely in the hands of director Paul Verhoeven and Tri-Star Pictures. Revealing secret parts of the film is not going to hurt the studio, and therefore, they won't care if you protest until the sun circles the Earth.

If the theory behind the mode of protest is to hurt ticket sales, forget it. Sure, a couple people might hear the secret while standing in line for tickets and go home without seeing the movie, but come on! Anyone who's gone all the way to a theater to see a specific film is not going to do anything else but see that film. They wanted to see it, and they will, even if they know some secret parts. Of course, they'll also sit in their ever-uncomfortable movie theater seats hating whoever told them the secret for the next two hours.

To get the point across to Tri-Star Pictures, which is directly responsible for making the movie, the protests have to hurt the studio in some way. Keep the executives from going into work. Prevent them from shipping copies of the movie. Heck, even plain old protests in front of movie theaters will get the message across.

But telling me essential elements of a film — me, a member of the general public, me, an individual who had nothing whatsoever to do with the making of the movie — will NOT send the message to the studio.

So to those members of the lesbian, bisexual and gay community who are currently protesting Basic Instinct in the ways I have described, or to those who are planning to, I ask: If someone ran up to you while you were waiting in line with your date to see a thriller/mystery movie containing scenes that portray heterosexuals poorly, and that someone thrust themself into your face and yelled "The butler did it!" what do you think you would remember most about your ruined evening? The person's cause. . .

. . . or the effect?

Origin defines 'true'

DANA FORRAR

U2's first album didn't propel them to superstar status. Now I don't wish to compare an up and coming California band to U2, but there is promise. True and honest music with thoughtful lyrics are hard to come by in this day and age, and the Origin is a band who defines the word true.

The meaning of the word origin is beginning, or roots, and this is what this band has returned to. Based on the innovative and thoughtful acoustic antics of Michael Andrews, bassist Topper Rimei and drummer Rony Abada, the Origin have put together a new kind of pop sound.

This isn't Top 40 junk music, but generally upbeat tempo, always thoughtful of what their aim of each song is. This isn't your average alternative group either "There's enough bands out there that are very aggro, with all this aggression, like they puke their music out," says Andrews. "We try to let ours flow out of us."

Their first album came out last spring and made a name for them. Now it's time for Bend, their new album, to bring them the popularity they truly deserve. They were aided in the studio by producer Jeffrey Wood (who has worked with the Waterboys, Luka Bloom and the Housemartins), and have also been molded by opening for Lenny Kravitz, Jesus Jones and Midnight Oil.

The Origin is touring in support of their new album this spring, and a chance to catch them over spring break proved worthwhile. While going on late at "TT the Bear's" in Boston, their immediate presence confirmed their sound. Four skinny guys, verging on the point of anorexic, tan, looking like just a coupla guys, from California.

WFNX in Boston pushed the new album and the new single, "Bonfires Burning." With the energy of the quick, punchy guitar solo blending into an organ solo, the lyrics just as quick, but identifyingly beautiful. "Am I stupid and stoned to even think that you care, for the beauty of a sunset sky, or a dandelion stare."

Other gems include potential singles "Racing with the Moon," "Jumping to Fail," as well as personal favorite "Candymine," a Pink Floyd cool summer breeze type of song, reminiscent of "Wish You Were Here."

If you get a chance, go to U.P.C. and ask for this band for the Spring Concert. They are still looking and could use some suggestions I'm sure. As for truth, get your refund for your Milli Vanilli tapes and buy the Origin.

Ethereal, with worms

By SCOTT KESNER
Collegian Staff

Lush is the disturbing ethereal band that has most recently caught the attention of my ears. There are a lot of new alternative bands out there today, and unlike most of them, this one is good. The release of their most recent album Spooky has brought to the London based quartet a temporary fixture on the alternative scene as well as a host of college radio fans.

Although at first you may find Spooky homogeneous enough to file away with your Warrant records, the initial amorphous continuum that may induce drowsiness will pass with replay. Soon after, it will vault along with distinction.

Spooky is an album for the subconscious mind. It's first single, "Nothing Natural," with its celestial croonings and hazy swirling comes under the guise of tranquility. It turns out to be as frightening as if you pleasantly snacking on a delicious sandwich when a big hungry rat comes along and wants to snack on the both of you. Like the images in my writing, this tune is capable of causing nightmares that only a good mom can comfort.

The wispy chorus of the modern age confessional, "For Love," vitalizes the hypnotic blur into a highly romantic experience and "Tiny Smiles," is more than just mellow.

Lush's unsettling song writing and vocal team of Miki Berenyi and Emma Anderson give the band a languid yet lovely sound by fusing jangly, often florescent, guitaring with breathy taciturn melodies. Miki Berenyi has bright glowing hair, which although unseen on vinyl, I believe to be a major contribution to the bands' sound.

"Untogether," is a song as well as the basic rhythmic concept for this album. Lush's staunch refusal to be accomodating to each other musically puts them in a special ilk. Unlike most bands who lack the discipline to practice togetherness, Lush plays off each other by design and creates wonderful mush.

Bassist Steve Rippon and drummer Chris Acland will give you little desire to deem them rhythm section God's, but, "Superblast," and "Laura," might convince you to vote them ahead of those ubiqui-

Murray plays UMass

By SEMAJ SELOM
Collegian Correspondent

In the past, players like John Coltrane, Thelonious Monk and Dexter Gordon have found their talents to be more appreciated in either Europe or Japan. This unfortunately also seems to be the case with tenor saxophonist David Murray. Yet despite the historical precedence, Murray may very soon receive his much warranted due here in the States.

Murray's "obscurity" has been partly due to his recording solely for smaller, hard-to-find labels based outside the States, such as Black Saint/Soul Note and DIW and Columbia, Murray will become more accessible to the public — a public which has been thirsting for a revitalization of so called "avant-garde" music.

Don't be fooled, however. Murray is far too important to be pigeon-holed into the "avant-garde" category, left to be mused over as some sort of eccentricity. His childhood days of playing in his family's church band, and his affinity for the tenor greats that came before Coltrane, have given Murray an explosive supply of creative fuel.

In the 1976, the World Saxophone Quartet (WSQ) was formed, a year after the arrival of Murray in New York. He had grown up in California, (b. Berkeley, 1955) studying at Pomona College with Stanley Crouch and Bobby Bradford before eventually heading East to create the WSQ with Oliver Lake, Julius Hemphill and Hamlet Bluiett. It was during this time however, that the "Jazz press" and recording industry had its eyes and ears on the comebacks of mainstreamers Red Rodney, Jackie McLean and others. Murray's arrival was unheralded, until he was heard playing in the loft of Sam Rivers.

Soon after, Murray found himself in the employment of Jack DeJohnette's Special Edition, John Carter's Clarinet Summit, Ed Blackwell and James "Blood" Ulmer.

Murray first recorded as a leader in 1976, but it wasn't until the 1982 release of his Murray's Steps (Black Saint 0065) that he began to catch the ear of more than just his peers. He was since formed his own quartet, octet and big band, all of which are currently employed (as much as a "jazz" group can be) in New York. Murray's range outside of New York has been limited, except for tours outside of the states. His upcoming show will give the Valley an important look at the most creative musical force in contemporary "jazz."

Murray creates an enveloping membrane of activity which forces the listener to truly hear what he has to say. He has synthesized the styles of Ben Webster, Paul Gonsalves and Lester Young into the most unique voice of any player in the last decade. He has also revived the bass clarinet, avoiding the ever-resent specter of Eric Dolphy to further his original sound.

The concert, the second of this year's Magic Triangle Series sponsored by WMUA radio, Ray Drummond on bass, and Tani Tabal on drums. Both Hicks and Drummond are two of the most sought-after accompanists today, their steadying, yet expression-inducing, influences being their main assets.

Hicks began his career in 1959, and his discography reads like an encyclopedia of the most important "jazz" players in history; Oliver Nelson, Johnny Griffin, Pharoah Sanders, Kenny Dorham, Art Blakey, Sonny Rollins, Freddie Hubbard, Lester Bowie, etcetera, etcetera.

Drummond has been employed as a side player on nearly 100 albums for over 20 different record labels. While learning the trade in San Francisco during the 1970s, Drummond spent time with vibraphonist Bobby Hutcherson and trumpeter Tom Harrell. More recently, he has ied dates for the Criss Cross, Theresa, and DMP labels, while also co-leading the Mingus Dynasty with Jack Walrath.

Percussionist Tani Tabal, a relative newcomer on the scene, spent his formative days in the 1970s in Detroit. Tabal was a member of the Creative Arts Collective, founded by Roscoe Mitchell, as well as playing and recording with Geri Allen, and Mitchell's "Sound Ensemble."

The David Murray Quartet will be in performance Thursday, March 26, at 8 p.m. in Hampden Theatre. Tickets are available at the Fine Arts Center box office, or by calling 545-2511. Prices are $7/$5 5-College students.

The Valley's Best!

By BRIAN HARRINGTON

Let's go dancing. There are two local band showcases this weekend that both feature acts with a funky beat and a whole lot of heat.

JABBERWOCKY

The real show in town is on CBS tonight as the UMass Minutemen continue on their quest to reach the Final Four NCAA Championships. The Hatch in the Student Union has not only lined up extra big screen TV's and put the beer on ice, but they they've also got a terrific stage show scheduled immediately after the game telecast.

Who's Kiddin' Who, without a doubt the best dance band in the area, is set to perform in the Hatch tonight along with The Bombastics. This is one the best shows featuring local bands that you'll find at the Hatch this semester.

This is the second gig that these groups have played together at the Hatch, and their show last semester brought a decent sized crowd but not near as much as these bands draw when they play clubs like Sheehan's Cafe and Pearl Street. Word to the wise; check it out.

Who's Kiddin' Who were the winners of the Rock 102/Pearl Street "Battle of the Bands" last year and they beat out a slew of top local acts in receiving these honors. The group features a really hot horn section along with a rhythm section that will not let up all night. These guys do everything from soca and calypso to real grungy funk and rap.

What makes this band so much fun is that they are a large ensemble, so that vocals and solos are easily traded off during the course of a set and the band presents a big sound with polyrhythmic percussion and a wall of horns. The size of the group allows them to add a variety of dynamics to their music and stage act.

The Bombastics are a fresh act that parallel bands like Fishbone and the Chili Peppers in their sound and attitude. This is more of straight in-your-face funk with a big bottomed beat and heavy bass grooves. The Bombastics also feature horn players and their music is definitely worthy of attention.

This is an excellent lineup and one of those Hatch events that is worth attending, especially to either kick back or work off some sweat and energy after the hoop game.

On the same subject of great local lineups, the Vertex in Hadley is featuring a band showcase this Friday night that includes local favorites Baba Yaga and Agnes Moorehead.

Baba Yaga are a ska-flavored group with a lean towards the extended jam. They say they do it to just have fun, and that is evident in their stage show.

This gig will highlight the addition of a new keyboard player. Also featured will be new vocalist Cinnamon Blair. According to gutarist/vocalist Pete McCauley the new members help to create more depth and versatility to their sound.

Agnes Moorehead are a power trio who take their name from the late actress who starred in the "Bewitched" television serles of the 1960s. Their music however is anything but retro, as the band has a very contemporary alternative rock sound. This is garage rock and roll as it is's meant to be.

tous readers poll favorites, Larry Mullen Jr. and Adam Clayton of U2.

What makes Spooky appealing is the eloquence of its sound. This album has a lot to offer musically, sometimes more than you would like. There are a lot of worms beneath the surface. The albums' final track may be the only exception to this rule. "Monocrome," is simply a drowsy undercurrent of sound done waltz style.

Spooky is not a one ingredient album. Like many fine foods, it requires an acquired taste.

Tenure of Socrates inspiring

By DR. NEUTOPIA
Collegian Correspondent

Tenure for Socrates
John Huer
Bergin and Garvey

Have you ever journeyed through a university campus and wondered where to go to find the scholars who are working on the problem of humanity's survival?

Have you ever been curious as to where the scholars are who are creating visions of the Good World, a place where everyone can pursue the happy life regardless of their economic background, skin color and sex?

If you are lost as to where to go, head for the library and read professor John Huer's recent book Tenure for Socrates. There you will find the reason why it is so difficult to find wisdom on campus.

You will understand why truth-seekers rarely achieve tenured faculty positions and why ones with tenure do not challenge orthodox ideas. You will see how this special privilege has been abused by the faculty members who grant it to their peers in a vicious circle which is programmed to eliminate the social critic and creative thinker from university life.

Huer writes about the peer review process: "The 'peers' as a collectivity have become a more fearsome and feared instrument of thought control never imagined even under the old Grand Inquisition. The fear they can strike, the power they can exercise, and the control they can exert have made the peers perhaps the most terrifying of all controlling mechanisms in modern times."

Huer uses the "he" pronoun throughout the book because he points out that only one out of five tenured faculty members in America are women. He potently expresses the causes of the corruption of the soul of the average professor who is comfortable making an average salary, who has used tenure as a means to an economic end. The cause of this corruption, Huer states, is the infantilism of self-interest which enslaves the "scholar" to his own narrow vision which produces only mediocre, unimportant and meaningless papers that no one can understand or would ever want to understand.

He writes, "the system as a whole is rotten to the core, and its corruption is so widespread and deep that anyone who wants a modicum of change ends up crying, 'where do you start?'"

Once a scholar has discovered truth, it is almost impossible for that truth to get to the public, since the two channels of self-expression, the academic journals and the market press, will only publish articles which propagandize the orthodoxy and books which have market appeal, according to Huer.

Needless to say, faculty have, for the most part, lost their social influence by the loss of their personal integrity. Embedded in their conservative inertia, they feel no commitment, passion, and interest in the truth. For these debased souls, their professorship is just an ordinary job which maintains the status quo. Huer observes that the typical professor's "routine day' is an evil day, and his 'routine activity' is nothing but another evil deed."

Tenure is a principle based on society's absolute need for justice. Academic professors are the guardians of the truth, which Huer believes may be the "only antidote currently available to the relentlessly self destructive market mechanism."

Huer sees an academic career as a calling to profess the truth for the benefit and perfection of humanity. The truth is personal knowledge which means tenure was created to protect the individual scholar from physical or financial harm so that (s)he will be able to speak the truth as it is revealed to her or him however painful and unpopular it might be to the public.

Huer thinks tenure is one of the most extraordinary intelligent ideas implemented in the history of the planet. America is the only nation-state system to give its truth-tellers freedom to criticize the system.

'Prince of Persia' new for GameBoy

Special to the Collegian

"Prince of Persia"
for Nintendo GameBoy
Virgin Games, $30

The Sultan's out of town, dig, and Jaffar this big, bad, snarling dude in a headwrap, has seized the reins of the reign. No, he didn't just exit the spa at Club Sahara, but he sure is steamed.

"But why, Great Swami, why?" Because, O Nosy One, there'll be no royal rag exhibit, no blinding jewel-and marble halls, and no camel with leather bucket seats without the princess' hand in marriage. A-HA! And if he can't have her hand, then Jaffar will most certainly have her head. There is one hope however, namely that nameless, faceless, foolhardy man-of-her-dreams, you. (Dear DATELESS IN THE OASIS: Perk up! Rescuing princesses can work wonders for your social life!)

Little does she know, Operation Rapunzel's master planner currently resides in a dungeon 18 tiers underground, courtesy of Jaffar. So forget about all the riches you stand to lose, or the slightly important fact that the princess has but one hour to live.

Things are so dangerous down here in fact, you may never see your monogrammed bottle of Coppertone again. Dash from under eerie shadows cast by massive walls of stone, leap from ledge to crumbling ledge, avoid the pointy teeth of bone-crumbling, slam-banging blades, and blurt out whatever prayers you know, real quick.

Summer!

Summer in Boulder, Colorado. Who can describe it? You won't want to miss it. Here's your chance to make the summer of '92 one you'll always remember.
Think community. The Boulder campus takes on a special quality in the summer. Faculty come to class in shorts. Small discussion groups meet under the trees on the lawn. You find yourself part of a comfortable learning community—who work, study, or just relax together.
Think challenge. Choose from over 500 courses, including archaeological field study in Steamboat Springs, production with the Colorado Shakespeare Festival, an intensive Spanish institute, a biology field course on plants of Colorado, performance with the Colorado Lyric Theatre festival, and much more.
Think money. Tuition in the summer is lower than during the following academic year.
Think outdoors. Colorado has more than 1,000 spectacular peaks soaring above 10,000 feet and 53 peaks over 14,000 feet. Boulder has parks, open space, and hiking and biking trails galore. Boulder is the place to be outdoors

The animation in "Prince of Persia" is nothing short of incredible. The fluid motion of the characters has to be seen to be believed. The movement of the figures is based on detailed studies of athletes on the go. Therefore, performance of all jumping, running, climbing, stopping short, and falling looks so REAL, you'll have a hard time convincing yourself that it's just a game.

"Prince of Persia" is action-packed, and chock full of challenge. Can't get there by climbing? Try falling! Each level (of which there are more than enough to keep even the most jaded of Nintendo heads spinning in multi-multi marathon) has its own exit door for you to find, and is fraught with its own unique dangers between you and the way out.

Battle bearded guards in some of the most realistic sword-fighting you're likely to see anywhere, simulated or not. Watch your alter-ego's belly burble as he swigs a healing potion.

Along the way, you'll even encounter the skulls and bones of those less fortunate than you, and of course, to never quite make it. But they had neither the lovely vision of the princess to sustain them in their flight from evil, nor the sense of desert sand swirling, etching away time, grain by grain.

SNAP OUT OF IT BOY!

Oh, sorry. Like I said, you've got one hour to finish each and every level that "Prince of Persia" has, or it's no more nights at the camel races for you or the babe.

After successful completion of a level, you will receive a numerical password, which can be used to access the next section in this house of horrors, BUT (and this is a biggie) with the same amount of time you had left at he end of your previous triumph.

In other words, if you're really serious about this rescue thing, it means going back again to slash as much as possible from your previous "killer" time. "Prince of Persia" can be beaten though, or so they say, but I wouldn't count on doing anything else like eating or sleeping in the mean time.

But, sadly enough, he says the abuse of tenure by "sloth, flattery or apology, and self-interested corruption of mind [has threatened to end] perhaps the most ingenuous and noblest system of self-improvement and self-perfection" through its own self-destruction.

Huer explains how self-interest makes true the impossible, which is why the university has become a hostile place for the truth-pursuers.

Huer realises the role of the scholar is to be the history-maker, the one who revolutionizes society through the reintroduction of great ideas. The battle lines within the soul of the academic professor are also clearly marked out for him between self-interest and academic freedom. He asks, "Can this man who is fixed for life be persuaded to rise to noble height of academic freedom and truth?"

However, it seems absolutely essential that the professor persuades his colleagues and the world that "happiness is a moral issue, not a material one." It is indeed time to inspire the tenured faculty to re-examine the purpose of their privileged position so that the "noble impulse of moral salvation" can be reborn. As Huer proclaims, "material scientists and functional experts want to control our world. The truth liberates us from it."

As faculty members begin to open their eyes to the horizons beyond the Ivory Tower, they will see that it is indeed time to transform society by feeding the starving, building eco-cities for the homeless, and liberate education so that everyone aspires to reach their own self-knowledge. In fact, we now have all the necessary technologies to create a miraculous planet.

Huer's book brings the wisdom of Socrates back to life. Through the excellent quality of his virtuous work Academia seems to have tenured the gadfly to lead us out of the grand inquisition of modern times.

But the question remains: does Huer realize there is no truth or happy life without true love between the sexes? Does he know that the marriage of the minds is the sole bond of moral scholarship, the greatest idea of all, and the ultimate power to manifest world peace?

DSS to make changes

Adoption bill gets mixed reviews

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — With troubles at the state Department of Social Services hovering in the background, the Legislature's Judiciary Committee heard mixed testimony Wednesday on bills aimed at speeding adoption of foster children.

The measures were sponsored by House Minority Leader Peter Forman (R-Plymouth), the committee's House chairman, Rep. Salvatore DiMasi (D-Boston), and backed by Social Services Commissioner Gerald Robinson.

One would establish a specific time period, possibly 15 months to 18 months, after which the state could move to terminate the rights of biological parents of a child in foster care. The other would streamline court procedures for terminating parental rights.

Robinson said he would propose some changes to the time-limit bill, but supported its concept.

But Rep. Marie Parente (D-Milford) said the measures were good bills at the wrong time.

Parente said giving DSS more authority over the placement of children would be a mistake, given the agency's problems.

DSS has come under severe criticism for its handling of several foster care cases and the Weld administration put the department into fiscal receivership on Friday because of budgetary mismanagement dating back several years.

In one case, Mikey, an 11-year-old foster child, was removed abruptly from his foster home in Hubbardston. Mikey's former foster mother, Lynn Sanborn, and a supporter, Kris Zottol of Fitchburg, have contended the department retaliated against their campaign to bring Mikey home by investigating them for child abuse, based on an anonymous complaint.

A Leicester couple, the Laydens, are fighting to regain custody of two foster children they were in the process of adopting until DSS decided to reunite the children with their natural father, who has a record of drug and assault charges.

Bonnie Layden attended the hearing, but did not testify because of a court order that she not comment on the case.

A friend, Nancy Kvalita, agreed with Forman there should be a time frame in which children should be released for adoption and a time frame for biological parents to re-enter their children's lives.

But she said the Forman bills need fine tuning before being passed.

Forman acknowledged that his bills would no solve DSS's problems.

But he said they are aimed at bringing stability to the lives of the children caught in they system.

"A child should not have to live in fear of an absent parent," Forman said.

Conservatives want to ground Big Bird

By STEPHANIE SCHOROW
Associated Press

BOSTON — The battle over Big Bird has begun.

The ideological conflict that engulfed the National Endowment for the Arts may be headed toward the Public Broadcasting System. Shows such as "Frontline," "Masterpiece Theatre" and even "Sesame Street" are being dragged into the fray.

Conservative watchdog groups, with the support of some conservative U.S. senators, are targeting PBS for what they call unbalanced programming at taxpayers expense.

The immediate point of contention is a $1.1 billion funding bill, pending in the U.S. Senate, which would fund the Corporation for Public Broadcasting for 1994 to 1996. This agency disperses money for PBS, National Public Radio and local public radio and television programming.

Led by Republican leader Robert Dole of Kansas and Sen. Jesse Helms of North Carolina, senators slammed PBS for, among other things, producing favorable documentaries on an El Salvador guerrilla and using as political commentators "liberal Democrats" Bill Moyers and William Greider.

The underlying issue is whether PBS television stations — such as WGBH-TV in Boston — lean pointedly to the left while living off the federal dole.

That's the argument of Larry Jarvik, a resident scholar with the conservative Heritage Foundation. He contends that PBS programs favor liberal positions, from gay rights to nuclear energy, and argues that until PBS frees itself from partisan leanings, it should get no federal tax dollars.

"My basic argument is a public trust is being used for private ends," said Jarvik.

Republican challenger Patrick Buchanan turned PBS funding into a campaign issue when he blasted a documentary about gay black life, shown on some PBS stations, as evidence that the Bush administration was funding "pornographic and blasphemous art."

Dole has criticized the Children's Television Workshop, which produces "Sesame Street" and other educational programs, for taking federal money when it is reaping financial benefits from the licensing of characters such as Big Bird.

"Sesame Street" should now be offered to commercial stations, he contends. The idea sends shudders through CTW officials who don't want to see Cookie Monster, Big Bird and the gang interrupted by commercials.

Jeanne Hopkins, spokesperson for WGBH-TV, which produces about a third of the prime-time PBS programs, said that a single program may represent one position, but overall PBS programming presents a variety of opinions.

"It's a matter of balancing one point of view or another over time," she said.

The system, for example, supports "Firing Line," hosted by conservative commentator William F. Buckley, she noted.

"Do we raise topics you don't find elsewhere? Yes, the mandate of public broadcast is to be an alternative. I don't think that makes us liberal."

Each PBS TV station is individually run by community-based boards of trustees.

Archaeologists wrap up dig on Cape Cod

EASTHAM (AP) — Archaeologists said Wednesday they were wrapping up excavations at a prehistoric Native American site on a Cape Cod beach.

The four-month dig unearthed spear points, pottery fragments, and evidence of hearth fires and lodge poles, said Frank Ackerman of the Cape Cod National Seashore.

Artifacts at the site on Coast Guard Beach date back as far as 3,000 B.C., encompassing the Middle Archaic and Middle Woodland periods, Ackerman said.

Laboratory tests on the hundreds of excavated pieces were to begin immediately.

The National Parks Service, which organized the excavation, had speeded up digging because of coastal erosion in the area. The site was found almost two years ago and then handed over to the Parks Service for proper excavation.

"There was a great deal of time pressure," Ackerman said.

The site is valuable because, unlike other archaeological sites, it is relatively undamaged, Ackerman said. The site had remained clear of future human settlements, according to Ackerman.

"It was buried in windblown sands and was not disturbed by agricultural or construction activity," he said.

UM prof journeys through mime

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

A Japanese woman's journey of self-discovery is the theme of a one-woman mime performance by a University of Massachusetts professor of Japanese tonight at Hampshire College.

The show, titled "My Snow White," will be performed by professor Motoko Maeda-Dworkin at 8 p.m. It is free and sponsored by the Asian Pacific Student Association and Hampshire's Multicultural Affairs Program.

Maeda-Dworkin performs her intimate semi-autobiographical account of a Japanese woman's journey from youth to adulthood along with the music of John Sprague. The accompaniment consists of piano, marimba and flute.

"[The show] is loosely drawn from my own and other women's life experiences in Japan as daughters and as women," writes Maeda-Dworkin in a formal statement of her work.

The 65-minute show consists of three acts. 'My Mother and I,' and 'Into the Woods Named Tokyo' are followed by 'My Prince Comes and Goes,' in which "[Motoko] is caught in a dilemma between striving for her own goals and wanting to keep love/protection from a man," says Maeda-Dworkin.

She continues, "When she achieves one and loses the other, she tastes the bitter-sweet fruit of the struggle, and thus grows into true, adult womanhood."

"Mime is often considered to be a European theater tradition, but as a Japanese woman mime, I strive to add a new, unique dimension to the art form," Maeda-Dworkin stresses. "I aim to show a woman's strength, dignity and inner spirit that is so personal to me and yet universal."

"I aim to add a new dimension because all of the mimes are men in white face. I don't see any Asian mimes around me," says Maeda-Dworkin.

Mulligan also said the statistics for sexually transmitted diseases suggest many teen-agers are at risk of becoming infected with the AIDS virus.

Overall, the syphilis rate in the state dropped from 19.5 of every 100,000 people in 1990 to 16.1 of every 100,000 last year.

The gonorrhea rate dropped from 1215.1 per 100,000 to 99.4, and the chlamydia rate from 204.1 to 181.1.

While the number of cases of syphilis dropped in Boston, Lawrence and Lowell, it remained high.

The number of syphilis cases increased only in Springfield, from 71 per 100,000 in 1990 to 117 per 100,000 last year.

Housing advocates push for $400M bond

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Housing advocates urged lawmakers Wednesday to pass a $400 million bond bill for affordable housing, although the Weld administration is trying to limit the state's long-term debt.

Advocates said the bill would either add or improve up to 8,000 units of housing stock for people with low to moderate incomes. Even if the bond goes forward, the demand for housing will not be met, they told a legislative committee on housing and urban development.

In Boston alone, there are 13,000 families on waiting lists for housing, according to the Massachusetts Affordable Housing Alliance.

But the bill comes at a time when Gov. William Weld is trying to limit the state spending on long-term projects for everything from housing to transportation.

Housing advocates said the state has not issued housing bonds since 1987, and some projects that began with that money now need more to be completed.

Mary Nee, director of Boston's public facilities department, said despite the drop in real estate prices, Massachusetts remains an expensive state to buy a home.

"For most of the commonwealth's homeowners and renters the softening market still means hard times," she said.

The bond measure would fund public housing renovations, housing for people with special needs, elderly housing, lead removal and the purchase of foreclosed properties. Supporters also said the state can use the money to leverage $30 million to $60 million in federal dollars for housing.

Rep. Raymond Jordan (D-Springfield), a co-chairman of the housing committee and a co-sponsor of the bond bill, said the measure will also spur the economy. "Thousands of jobs in the construction trades can be produced through the rehabilitation work that will result from the passage of this bill," Jordan said.

The Executive Office of Communities and Development would oversee the bond money. The agency has a bond cap this year of $60 million set by the administration, and housing advocates said the three-year bond measure would require increasing that cap.

Communities and Development Secretary Mary Padula, who would oversee the bond authorization, said she is working on a housing plan to present to Weld by May. She said her first priority is to protect existing housing stock that needs to be repaired, improved or de-leaded.

"Our intention is to focus on maximizing limited state resources," she said.

Housing advocates were encouraged by Padula's appearance at the committee hearing. But Administration and Finance spokesman Dominic Slowey reiterated the governor's commitment to control spending on capital projects.

"We will take a look at what's in the bond authorization and see if there is any room to do any more for housing," said Slowey.

national recognition that this University deserves," he said.

Olver said he would be watching the game and cheering on the UMass basketball team tonight. "In closing, I would like to say Go!, Go U!, Go UMass!," he said.

David Curley, assistant manager of the University Store, said UMass basketball tee-shirts have been selling very quickly.

"Just this week the University Store has sold thousands of basketball tee-shirts," he said.

Kris Tyrrell, a senior anthropology major, said she wouldn't be watching the game tonight because she has to attend a lecture.

"I'm not upset about missing the game. I'm actually hoping it is a good lecture," she said.

She said she ordinarily doesn't follow basketball. "The UMass basketball team will win or lose whether I watch the game or not," she said.

glad to see the Minutemen finally getting the recognition they deserved.

The Amherst Select Board may also organize events in tribute to the team's success, possibly including a parade.

Sarah Bolton, a souvenir vendor, said she is selling UMass "Sweet 16" shirts in Amherst at the same rate that she sells "Final Four" shirts in other parts of the country.

Both students and residents said they eagerly look forward to showing their appreciation upon the team's return from the tournament in Philadelphia.

"Motoko is a talented artist with an original mimetic vision. It is inspiring and refreshing to see a Japanese woman's perspective. I respect her ability to create real, living, breathing characters, and not caricatures which typically seen in mime," says her present mime instructor, Robert Rivest.

Maeda-Dworkin began pursuing her interest in mime when she was on exchange here at UMass in her undergraduate years.

"I was looking for some way to be creative on my own, and Western theatre is closed to me because I am Japanese. What kind of role could I get?" asks Maeda-Dworkin.

Maeda-Dworkin trained in Tokyo with Kiyote Shimizu. She toured with her art to Canada and performed in the Vancouver Exposition in 1986.

The vanity used as a prop in her performance is purposely reminiscent of Snow White's "mirror, mirror on the wall," says Maeda-Dworkin. "This is a take-off on the traditional, sexist fairy tale like Snow White in which some prince will kiss you and marry you. I grew up with similiar stories in Japan."

Ed Andelman arouses anger

Eddie Andelman is a fat pile of [expletive] who inhales hot dogs at a frantic pace. All he does is try to stir up controversy and has no right to make the comments he has about UMass and its basketball program.

Andelman has always been the center of controversy for as long has he's been on Boston radio. One has to wonder why a person with so many faults would want to put himself in this position.

For those of you who don't know, Andelman has been making degrading comments about our university while singing the praise of Boston College.

First of all Andelman, where's BC now? Oh yeah, they are at home after losing to URI which UMass beat three times this year! Where's your alma mater BU now, you cow?

Morrissey/Crofts

Meanwhile our "terrible" university is still playing in the Sweet 16 baby! We don't know what happened between you and UMass that has left you so scarred, but whatever it was, it's over so stop eating your sour grapes!

You called the Cage a "snakepit" and it's fans "snakes" — well you're office is a pasture and you're a cow! You also say that we drink milk "straight from the cow"; we wouldn't drink your sour milk so MOO MOO, BIG FELLA!

Back to your basketball knowledge, Andelman: you already said Umass would lose to both Fordham and Syracuse so obviously you don't read the sports pages when you eat donuts in the morning.

If you did Andelman, you'd realize that UMass is the only team in the nation with four 1,000 point scorers and that the Minuteman are also tied with Duke for the most wins in the nation.

You must have a pretty sad life if all you do is put down our State U. during its most successful season. We know the Red Sox aren't fair game, seeing that their season has yet to begin, but that gives you no right to put us down!

If UMass beats Kentucky tomorrow night, we can only imagine what you'll say to put us down. If they win, however, I guarantee you'll be hearing from the both of us. Don't ever drive west of I-495 Eddie, or we'll blow you're fat [expletive] away with our muskets!

UMass fans, call up Eddie at 1-800-989-WEEI tonight between 4 and 7 p.m. and give his fat [expletive] something to think about.

Michael Morrissey and Jeff Crofts are Collegian columnists.

Andelman attacks UMass

Over the last few weeks the University of Massachusetts at Amherst has been subject to an angry and unfair diatribe from WEEI Sports Radio personality Eddie Andelman, abuse the students of UMass shouldn't take sitting down.

Andelman, spurred by the success of the University's basketball program, has turned the attention of his simple mind toward UMass. His tirade has grown from a few tounge-in-check jokes about Amherst being in the sticks to unfair comments about UMass students supposedly not being intelligent enough to attend any other university.

He's added that the University is only for students looking to learn how to grow corn or milk cows, that UMass students are not as intelligent as those from Boston College and Boston University, that UMass is a waste of his tax money, that UMass students are all hicks who are too stupid to last an hour on the streets of Boston, that UMass basketball fans are snakes and the Curry Hicks Cage is a snake pit. He's quick to say that UMass is not his state university and calls UMass "a nice little school".

It's easy to kick something when it is down and that's what Andelman is doing with UMass. He's not man enough to attack an institution in his listening area. It takes very little courage to talk behind our back, maybe the "snakes" are not UMass fans but the man in Andelman's mirror.

In the past UMass would just take a kick in the face and do nothing about it. I suggest our attitude should change.

No one stands up for UMass. Not our legislature, not our alumni and not our faculty or administration. It often seems no one cares about us, and that's why Andelman can get away with his smear campaign.

Does anyone have the guts to confront Eddie Andelman? He certainly does't think so, but there's no doubt in my mind the student body does.

We can 't allow a major media personality to get away with these types of attacks. The best thing we can do is jam his phone lines, ruin his talk show and let Andelman know that UMass won't tolerate this type of thing to occur.

I implore you to take the time today to call WEEI and talk UMass basketball. Let's crash Mr. Andelman's Pro-Kentucky party. Flood the airwaves with pro-UMass talk and let Andelman know that UMass bashing will not be tolerated. If no one else is going to stand up for UMass then we'll have to do it ourselves.

Tonight we can rock Boston with more phone calls than WEEI ever imagined possible. Believe me — the Boston media is waiting. Both the Boston Globe and The Boston Herald have a strong dislike of Mr. Andelman. A wave of UMass calls will make headlines in both papers. Most of Boston would love to see Andelman put in his place. And we are just the people to do it.

The price of the call is on WEEI and the man on the other line is a despicable, unimaginative, immature, ignorant snob. Please let him know how you feel from 4-7 p.m. tonight.

Dan Wetzel is a Collegian Staff member. The opinions expressed in this column do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian.

Dan Wetzel

Concerning the basketball team Andelman has proven his lack of knowledge by saying UMass had no player taller to 6-foot-3 and predicting UMass would lose to Fordham, Syracuse and that the Minutemen would lose to Boston College 9 out of 10 times if they played. Tonight, Andelman is hosting a Kentucky Fan Appreciation Night on his show from 4-7 p.m.

Although 590 AM WEEI can not be heard in Amherst, the station has set up a toll free number for listeners to call from all over the region. The talk show's number is 1-800-989-WEEI and (617) 242-WEEI. Perhaps you have a thing or two to say to Mr. Andelman. The WEEI program director can be reached at (617) 242-5900. I am sure everyone at WEEI would love to hear from us stupid hicks.

Andelman's comments concerning UMass reflects the attitude of many media members in the Boston area. It 's a shame that a major radio personality is so threatened by the UMass Basketball team's recent success that he has to lash out like an immature child.

For the past two weeks, Andelman has taken the same cheap shots at the University over and over, calling his maturity and intelligence level into question.

His comments have demeaned the student body and have belittled the accomplishments of the basketball team. For some reason he is motivated to not allow the University to enjoy its brief moment in the limelight.

My guess for his motivation — he's a snob. Andelmen lives in Brookline, Mass., and he grew up wealthy and attended Boston University. He'as made millions of dollars over the past few years in real estate development and has two sons attending Union College in Schenactady, NY.

Andelman has always had problems dealing with fans from a lower income bracket. He likes the Celtics and Boston College but calls Bruins fans toothless goons who can not read, write or eat with utensils.

Now he's moved his senseless mudslinging onto UMass.

Minicucci's teammate Bill Roth, currently the top-ranked gymnast in the country, will also be competing.

UMass's own Cal Booker, a 1990 NCAA Finalist who currently holds the school record in the all-around, will face off against Roth and Minicucci. Booker and UMass junior Steve Christensen are hoping to score high enough this weekend to qualify for NCAA regional competition.

UMass is the number three seed this weekend, and will look to avenge previous losses this season to the number one and two seeds, Temple and Syracuse respectively.

Rounding out the competition will be Army, Springfield, Navy and Cortland, teams that the UMass gymnasts have already beaten this season.

Competition begins at 7:00 Friday night in the Cage, and continues throughout the day on Saturday.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): An extra work assignment gives you a chance to shine. You need to tackle something entirely on your own. Slow down the tempo in business and romance. A hasty commitment could bring regrets.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Say "no" to financial hanky-panky and secret romantic liasons. Keep your nose to the grindstone at work. Tend to a health matter before it gets out of hand. Relax with good friends tonight.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Do not believe everything you hear today. Sift out the truth from the rumors going around. Repeating gossip would be a mistake. Bold ideas abound tonight. Relax with a friend tonight.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your thoughts turn to someone you would like to impress. Try not to come on too strong. Your best bet is not to keep other people guessing and off-guard. Friends respect your privacy.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Do not hesitate to suggest changes in living arrangements if it will help you pursue creative ideas. Get rid of distracting influences. A new hairstyle or wardrobe enhances your image.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Timely communications and local travel increase your influence. The outlook is bright for starting or completing a household project. A late afternoon phone call brings welcome news.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Unforeseen problems could threaten your own or shared funds. Delay making any major financial decisions. The evening favors your learning of business developments at a distance.

UMass hosts St. John's in home opener Saturday

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Spring doesn't really start at the University of Massachusetts until the lacrosse team makes its first pregame lap past the crowd assembled on the Hill.

Mark your calendars, because this year spring starts Saturday just before 1 p.m. That's when the Gorillas make their first UMass appearance, against St. John's at the future site of Dick Garber Field. Formerly known as Upper Boyden field, the home of UMass lacrosse will be officially christened on April 11.

St. John's is currently 2-2, and will probably be 3-2 after tonight's match with Siena. While SJU hasn't beaten any good teams yet, in two losses they played Yale close (12-10) and had their chances against Georgetown (16-8).

"This is always a big game for us," said St. John's assistant coach Ernie Olsen. "The Hill is a great place to play a lacrosse game, it's a great atmosphere."

UMass, on the other hand, comes into Saturday's game 0-1 courtesy of a 17-10 loss at Loyola. The Gorillas have had a week to think about the mistakes which cost them a win over the No. 2 team in the nation. They also will be looking to show the home fans on the Hill what they've got.

What UMass has, and what lax fans should look for, is a balanced offensive attack, a defense which, despite the loss of two-time All-America Rick Mullins, proved against Loyola it can shut down the opposition, and four goalkeepers who are all capable of starting.

The Gorillas suffered considerable graduation losses from last year's 9-4 NCAA quarterfinal team. Gone are leading scorer and assist man Jim McAleavey, midfielders Jim Kushner and Rick Senatore, defensemen Ed and Hugh O'Callahan and goalkeeper Ted Kellerman.

Another key loss is All-American defenseman Mullins, who opted to redshirt this season after tearing three of four ligaments in his knee during last year's 20-9 NCAA quarterfinal loss to Loyola.

UMass does, however, return a large percentage of its scoring from last season. Much of that is in the person of junior attacker Mark Millon. Millon, the team's leading goal scorer last season, will be called on to distribute the scoring from behind the cage as McAleavey did the past two seasons.

"Millon is a pretty fine lacrosse player just starting to come into his own," Garber said of the Hunnington, N.Y. native.

Last season, Millon carried much of the scoring load along with McAleavey. This year, Garber sees a more balanced attack.

"I think we'll have more balance," Garber said. He cited Billy Edell (2 goals, 1 assist vs. Loyola) and Wes Depp (1 goal) as compliments to Millon's scoring, along with Mario Guaglianone and Mike Cain, who will shift between attack and midfield as he did last season.

At midfield, Garber is looking for consistency from returning players as well as contributions from newcomers. Peter Falvey, who like Cain will switch between attack and midfield, Chris Nentwich and Pete Cuda are among top returnees. Senior John Schlipf will also see playing time and Garber hopes this "should be a big year" for him.

Midfield is also where many of the Gorillas' newer players are. Garber says Greg Kline, a sophomore, "should really open some eyes." Ernie Faulkner, a freshman, played well against Loyola and should see plenty of action. Andy Fish, a transfer from Herkimer County Community College (N.Y.), will also make an impact.

"The midfield doesn't have a lot of flash but it's more important they be consistent than flashy," Garber noted.

Defense is where UMass shone brightest against Loyola. A big part of that was senior captain Mario Lopez. Fellow seniors Corey Cronin, Brad Fitts and Gary Wood and junior Jim Panetta all return as well. Garber sees their experience as a distinct advantage.

"The nucleus of our defense is good," Garber said. "They play well together and communicate well."

Faceoff specialist Kevin O'Connor, regarded by many as the fastest player on the team, returns for his senior season. O'Connor made a habit of taking the faceoff all the way upfield and scoring and should provide the same advantage this year. Sophomore Sam Joseph will also take faceoffs.

The Gorillas have an embarrassment of riches in goal. Rip Correnti proved his composure facing Loyola's assault last weekend, Tom LoPresti was an All-American for West Islip, N.Y. and seniors Ray Suris and Pat Lorian are also possible starters. Again, Garber stressed consistency, saying the nod would go to the goalie who played the steadiest.

Junior Mark Millon looks is back this year for the Gorillas. UMass takes on St. John's at Garber Field Saturday.

UMass in Cage match, host EIGLs Saturday

By KIM ADDESA
Collegian Staff

The 1992 Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastics League Championship, which is being dubbed "A Pre-Olympic Spectacular" and featuring some of the country's top gymnasts, will be held this weekend in the Curry Hicks Cage at the University of Massachusetts.

The championship meet is the big one, the meet that head coach Roy Johnson and members of the UMass men's gymnastics team have been preparing for all season.

"This is what we have been working towards all season," said Johnson. "It is exciting that it is finally here and we will really be able to see the results of all of our effort.

"Not only is this meet exciting because it is the championship meet," said Johnson, "but having the championship at home, in front of your friends and family just makes it more exciting."

Confidence and comfort are also key factors in a meet of this magnitude. It will work to the advantage of the Minutemen that they will be able to get into the Cage and work on the set-up equipment twenty four hours before any other team.

"Being at home, getting a chance to workout before the meet, competing in front of your friends, it all helps and gives you a little more confidence," explained Johnson.

The meet, a showcase of some of the top collegiate gymnasts in the country, will give male gymnasts from the east a final chance to qualify for NCAA regional competition.

Highlights of the meet are sure to include performances from former United States Olympian Dominic Minicucci. Minicucci was a member of the 1988 Olympic team, and is currently the top competitor at Temple University.

"This is always a very exciting meet," said Johnson, "but having Olympic-caliber gymnasts here this year, and hosting it ourselves, just makes it more fun and exciting. A gymnast who represented our country in the Olympics will be competing

Minutemen face Kentucky in NCAAs

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — Scene one, take two — Kentucky versus Massachusetts.

When the University of Massachusetts (30-4) faces the University of Kentucky (28-6) tonight (7:41 p.m., CBS) it will be an entirely different performance than their first-ever back on Dec. 4 when Kentucky won 90-69.

There will be new actors — Kentucky's Gimel Martinez and Richie Farmer will start instead of Aminu Timberlake and Dale Brown.

There will be a new stage — The Spectrum in Philadelphia will replace Kentucky's Rupp Arena in Lexington.

There's a new setting — the NCAA Tournament versus a pre-conference matchup.

And the Minutemen players will feel like new — UMass had just returned from a week in the Great Alaska Shootout before landing in Kentucky less than 24 hours before the game.

But, the biggest question is: Will there be a different outcome?

"We don't know if we're good enough to beat Kentucky," University of Massachusetts coach John Calipari said. "They're a very, very strong club and are very well-coached. That game in Kentucky, they beat us. Forget about the trip, they were better prepared and they knew what they wanted to do to beat us.

"But this is another game," he said. "Our kids knew that that game is in the back of their minds and they did beat us up pretty good and we're going to have to be ready to compete against them."

In Lexington, UMass trailed by only five at halftime, 46-41. But, the Wildcats opened up a 15-point lead with five minutes to go as they hit 14 of 16 free throws down the stretch. Kentucky's Jamal Mashburn was the game's leading scorer with 28 and pulled down 10 rebounds. Jim McCoy led the Minutemen with 22.

"We are a lot different basketball team then we were back then," Kentucky coach Rick Pitino said. "We now have better shot selection and defense.

"The first half of our season, the team was playing well, but not the parts. Now all the parts are coming together."

Pitino was quick to point out that UMass is different now as well.

"They're running the same type of things, but Jim McCoy is playing a lot better. He was not playing as well as he is right now."

Both teams are hot. The Minutemen have won 14-straight games, 19 of their last 20, including three in the Atlantic 10 Tournament and two in the first and second rounds of ther NCAA Tournament (Fordham 85-58 and Syracuse, 77-71 in OT) in Worcester, Mass.

The Wildcats, the Southeastern Conference champions, have won six straight and 13 of their last 14, including wins over Old Dominion (88-69) and Iowa State (106-98) in the tournament.

"We're both playing our best basketball at the end of the season," said Pitino, in his third year at Kentucky. "Right now, they're just another opponent and we've got to win and advance on."

So what will the Minutemen have to do to keep the Wildcats from advancing and advance themselves?

"We don't match up with them," said UMass forward Will Herndon, who had six points, five rebounds and three steals in their last meeting. "We try to rely on our speed and quickness.

Collegian File Photo

Will Herndon (34) drives to the basket during last Sunday's NCAA second round game against Syracuse.

"We have to try to keep them from posting up inside and if they do get the ball we have to try to contest every three."

Calipari said, "We're just going to play the way we have all along. We're not going to try to fool anybody. The key is we'll have to make the game easier for each other and make the extra pass."

Are the Minutemen concerned?

"We don't really have any concerns at all," said McCoy. "We're just going to go in to play the game."

Calipari responded, "Let me requote him — 'We're very fearful of Kentucky.'"

Crofts' phone madness

Just how much has March Madness hit the public? Well, over Spring Break my good friend Clayton and I decided to try answer that very question.

To answer it, we agreed that a Big Dance Telepoll to the unsuspecting public would provide us with the most accurate answer.

We decided to call up 50 people and ask them the simple question "Who do you think is going to win the upcoming NCAA basketball tournament?" From the answers, we would deduct just how much March Madness has hit.

Jeff Crofts

An impressive 29 out of 50 people responded with actual teams in the Big Dance while the other 21 were amusing but incredibly clueless about the tourney.

We'll talk about the clueless wonders later on, for now let's talk about the 29 people who actually know something about the Dance.

Here's a list of all the teams in the tournament picked to win by the public:

• 1. Duke (picked 16 times — All aboard, the Bandwagon is now leaving!)

• 2. UMass (4 times — Nice to see the public following the home team!)

• 3. North Carolina (2 times — Sentimental favorite to a couple!)

The following teams were each picked once,

• 4. Iowa State (What the hell was this guy drinking!)

• 5. LSU (Call it the Shaq-factor!)

• 6. Arkansas (Good choice, but they played horribly against Memphis State!)

• 7. Indiana (Somebody obviously likes Bobby Knight!)

• 8. Kansas (Same story as Arkansas except their ouster was UTEP!)

• 9. Georgetown (Guess this person never saw the Hoya guards)

• 10. UCLA (What can I say, they're still in the hunt!)

Now let's look at the other answers, the one's that didn't actually involve any tournament teams:

• 1. "I'm not even sure what an NCAA is!"—As Alice Cooper once sang "Hey, hey, hey, hey, hey stupid!"

• 2. "I'd appreciate it if you don't call here anymore!"— Easy, pal!

• 3. "You're mother's gonna win the (expletive) tournament!" — Ouch!

• 4. "The Newburyport Clippers" — My alma mater, nice to see it!

• 5. "I couldn't give two (expletive)!" — He was probably watching "Dukes of Hazzard" reruns when we called!

• 6. "I know nothing about basketball!" — I appreciate the honesty!

And the two most popular answers,

• 7. "I don't know" — picked nine times, at least they could've thrown some spice into their answer!

• 8. "I don't care" — picked six times, at least they could throw some spice into their lives!

Pitino helped UMass in hiring of Calipari

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — If it weren't for University of Kentucky basketball coach Rick Pitino, the University of Massachusetts may not have been in the NCAA Tournament, let alone playing his Wildcats.

Because it was Pitino, a 1974 UMass graduate, who was on the selection committee to hire UMass Coach John Calipari and was instrumental in convincing the committee to side with the University of Pittsburgh assistant instead of another top candidate.

"What I told the committee I would do is be involved until it got down to two people and then I would like to bow out of it," said Pitino, who was the head coach for the New York Knicks at the time. "It got down to two people and I did bow out, but suddenly it was shifting away from John and I got back in it.

"I felt it was shifting away from John because people were knocking him. There were a lot of coaches trying to take him out of that position and that's why I stepped back into it.

"You want a young person, so be it. But, because other guys are knocking him that can't be," he said.

"That's why we should hire him because he's going to strike fear in the recruiting world and he's going to build this program," Pitino said, explaining his reasons for recommending Calipari's being hired.

In Calipari's four years at UMass, he has a 77-49 record, including two NIT appearances, an Atlantic 10 Championship, and the NCAA Tournament. Before Calipari, UMass had only one other NCAA Tournament berth, 1962.

But Pitino says he doesn't feel like tonight's game is any different than the rest just because he took part in hiring Calipari and is an alumnus.

"You root for them when you don't play them, but there is no extra emotion since I went there in this game," said Pitino, who was a three-year guard for the Minutemen.

And Pitino is the first to point out that the two don't have anything in common, unlike most people think.

"There aren't any similarities — just Italians with big noses," said the 39-year old. "Outside of that there are very few — in coaching and with style of play."

Calipari, who began his press conference with a cut-out mask of Pitino which Kentucky fans are known to wear, said of the differences, "I know his suit is worth $1,000 dollars and mine is worth $250. He has Gucci shoes on and I have itchy shoes on.

The 'endless' season comes to a halt

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The difference between the University of Massachusetts and the University of Kentucky basketball programs is simple.

Kentucky isn't satisfied with the season unless it wins a National Championship. UMass on the other hand is just happy to be a part of the Big Show.

Last night, in front of the jam-packed Spectrum, Kentucky (29-6) ended the Minutemen's miracle season, which captured the hearts of all of Massachusetts, 87-77.

The key play of the game came with 5:47 left to play. It actually wasn't a play. It occurred on the sideline. UMass trailed by two, 70-68. It was anybody's ballgame and UMass had the momentum on its side.

All of a sudden, referee Lenny Wertz whistled UMass John Calipari for a technical foul, apparently for being out of the coach's box.

Richie Farmer made both free throws, Deron Feldhaus scored a layup. Suddenly, the shell-shocked Minutemen trailed by 6, 74-68. They never did recover.

"If I stepped out of that box, he has the right to call a technical," said an emotionally-drained Calipari. "I'm very, very embarrassed that call was made. If I was wrong, I'm embarrassed."

"It took us out of the game mentally," said UMass center Harper Williams, who scored just 8 points before fouling out. "You have to grow after that and come back and fight. We didn't do that."

The entire UMass coaching staff could not understand why the technical was called.

"John was jumping up and down," said assistant coach Bill Bayno. "But I didn't hear him say anything to the official."

Calipari said, "I'm an emotional guy. Sometimes I am going to jump a little further than I mean to. But that call did not win or lose the game. It was a 2-point call. The timing made it a little worse, of course."

That is putting it mildly.

"We were on the verge of getting back into the game," said UMass guard Anton Brown. "It took a lot of wind out of our sails."

That is accurate.

"I think we would have won even without the technical," said Kentucky coach Rich Pitino. "But I always think that way. It was a 2-point difference."

Kentucky went ahead by 8 with 5:09 remaining after Feldhaus (11 points) scored another layup and you got the sense UMass was wilting.

Jim McCoy (21 points) gave UMass (30-5) hope that it wasn't too late to come back, when he scored a layup of his own with 2:50 left. However, Sean Woods sank two three throws and Dale Brown put the icing on the cake completing a 3-point play to put the Wildcats ahead by 11.

Kentucky came out sizzling in the first half. It hit 10 of its first 13 shots to open up a commanding 28-11 lead.

"We were scared to death [in the beginning of the game]," Calipari said.

Jamal Mashburn, who scored a game-

Two programs plan to merge into one major

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

Students will now be able to earn a Bachelor's degree in Biology since the Botany and Zoology departments are preparing to merge into one unified Biology department, according to the future assistant chair of the department.

Botany professor and future assistant head of the major, Jim Walker forsees many advantages to the creation of this major.

"There will be a natural evolution of closer cooperation of other areas so many areas tie together. We're able to integrate a number of areas together.

"Students will notice the change the most. They'll actually be able to get a degree in Biology. It is much more sensible," said Walker.

In addition, Walker said he thinks the major will increase student enrollment at the University.

"We would be able to attract more majors that way. More students want that degree," said Walker.

"Students may have a number of different concentrations [along with the major]. Other areas are more narrow," said Walker.

Zoology department professor and pre-medicine advisor Brian O'Connor said the move would broaden the pre-med curriculum and would help in producing better doctors.

"It will be an academic breath of fresh air," said O'Connor at a recent Faculty Senate meeting.

With the proposal of the new interdisciplinary Organism and Evolutionary Biology and the merging of facilities, there is much reorganizing underway, said Walker.

"There will be a lot more resources at the undergraduate level than either of the existing seperate programs. We'll get a synergistic effect," said Walker.

The department will be one of the largest with nearly 40 faculty in Life Sciences, compared to the present 60 members in 10 different departments, said Walker.

"We're going to put more resources into the department," said Walker.

Nat'l Guard in arms over cuts

Soldiers call Pentagon plan to reduce jobs unfair

(AP) — Massachusetts National Guard soldiers said Thursday they would shoulder an unfair burden under a Pentagon plan to cut more than 8,000 guard and reserve jobs statewide.

Under a list of proposed cuts the Pentagon sent to Congress, Massachusetts would lose 8,473 jobs, more than half of the Army and Air National Guard positions in the state.

Capt. Tammy Miracle, a National Guard spokeswoman in Reading, said Massachusetts would lose a bigger percentage of jobs than any other in the state. Most of the jobs are part-time.

"I think it stinks," said Major David Barisano of the 182nd Infantry in Melrose, where 650 jobs could be lost. "We will be going out of business if this goes down."

"We understand cuts have to be made. If they do they have to made across the board," Miracle said. "But they're telling us we have to cut 60 percent across the board, while the average for other states is 16 percent."

Other states with large numbers of cuts include California, with the loss of 12,775 people; Michigan, 7,212; New York, 9,865; Ohio, 8,041; Wisconsin, 6,546 and Illinois, 5,879.

Defense secretary Dick Cheney sent the proposed cuts to Congress, which must approve the plan.

"I think we ae going to be contentious there," Gov. William Weld said. "There is no guarantee of success when you are dealing with a national operation like the scaling back of the National Guard. But we're going to continue to make our voice heard in Washington on that."

Lieutenant Col. Thomas Taylor of the First Battalion of 211th Field Artillery in New Bedford, blamed politics for the cuts.

"They (the Pentagon) don't feel demographically we can support units, they don't feel we have the political base to fight their action," Taylor said.

Reservists complained the cuts would leave many with skills of little use to employers in a time of rising unemployment. Those who use the extra money for college may be forced to drop out, they said.

"This is going to put a lot of people out of business who aren't qualified to move into other areas," said Sgt. Joseph Alfonse of the 1st Squadron, 110th Cavalry based in Concord. "The biggest problem is there's no scheduled retraining programs."

Alfonse, 30, said he and his wife are expecting their first baby.

"I've been doing this 10 years, and I haven't finished college," he said. "I haven't figured out how to put my skills into use."

More than a dozen guard and reserve units would be closed in Massachusetts under the proposed reductions, ranging from the 104th Infantry in Westfield, where 751 jobs would be lost, to the 26th Division Band in Boston, with 41 part-time players.

At the headquarters of the 2nd Battalion, 104th Infantry, three Army National Guard medics were doing inventory and packing medical equipment into boxes.

Welcome home, UM Minutemen

The University of Massachusetts will hold a welcome home rally for members of the men's basketball team when they return from the NCAA tournament in Philadelphia.

Because of yesterday's loss, most of the Minutemen are expected to return today to Bradley Airport in Windsdor Locks, Conn. at 3 p.m.

As of now, University officials are unsure of the time of the team's return. When the time is set, the information will be broadcast on: WMUA 91.1 FM, WTTT 1430 AM, WRNX 100.9 FM, and WHMP 1400 AM, 99.3 FM.

Please listen to those stations for details.

Implant maker under fire

Lawyer advocates public access to medical files

By CHRIS TORCHIA
Associated Press

BOSTON — A California maker of breast implants should release documents showing it misled thousands of women about the potential danger of its products, a lawyer said Thursday.

Public access to McGhan Medical Corp. files will contribute to the national debate over whether silicone-gel implants are safe, attorney Fredric Ellis said at a hearing in U.S. District Court.

"There are a lot of women out there who have yet to suffer any ill effects and are frightened," Ellis said. "They have a right to know what the manufacturer knows."

The Food and Drug Administration, which is reviewing the safety of the gel implants, plans to make a final decision by April 20. The implant industry has suspended production of the gel implants pending that decision.

There have been allegations that the implants cause health problems, including cancer and auto-immune disorders. Dow Corning Corp., which has stopped making the device, faces hundreds of lawsuits.

Ellis is representing a woman who contends her breast implants, which were made by McGhan Medical of Santa Barbara, caused her to suffer rashes, joint pains and fevers up to 104 degrees.

The woman had the implants removed in 1987, seven years after they were installed, and has been feeling better, Ellis said.

"The manufacturer conducted a 15-year human experiment," he said. "Now they're trying to keep everything under wraps."

Lawyer Peter Puciloski said McGhan Medical's breast implants were safe, and denied the company had withheld damaging information from clients. He said the company had cooperated fully with FDA requests for documents.

But some company files should not be public because doctors who install the implants by surgery could no longer report privately on the devices, he said.

"I'm sure they don't want to be bothered by advocates on either side of it," Puciloski said.

Magistrate Judge Lawrence P. Cohen said it was not the court's responsibility to make public information that might help the national investigation into health risks associated with breast implants.

"This is a courthouse, this is not Congress," said Cohen, who took under advisement Ellis' request that McGhan Medical release its files.

Nepotism charges hit radio host

BOSTON (AP) — A former candidate for state treasurer accused popular radio talk show host Jerry Williams of hypocrisy for reportedly pushing state Treasurer Joseph Malone to give his girlfriend a public job.

Malone is a frequent guest on Williams' talk show on WRKO-AM, and Williams promoted Malone's candidacy for state treasurer during the 1990 campaign.

Williams frequently criticizes government workers, calling them "hacks" for getting state jobs through connections.

The Boston Globe, citing unnamed sources, reported Thursday that Williams has been asking Malone and his aides to find a new public job for Nancy Cook of Marshfield.

Cook has resigned her $31,000-a-year job at the State Lottery, which is under Malone's jurisdiction.

Williams did not respond to requests for comment, and Malone would neither confirm nor deny that Williams talked to him about Cook's job.

"I'm not going to get into who calls me or who doesn't, particularly when it relates to personnel matters," Malone said.

"The bottom line is Nancy Cook is resigning and is seeking other employment. I wish her the best."

Cook was hired by former state Treasurer Robert Q. Crane, a Democrat, who did not seek re-election in 1990.

Former Democratic state Rep. William Galvin, who ran against Malone for treasurer, said Williams is engaging in the kind of politics he condemend for years, and accused the talk show host of "a very high degree of hypocrisy."

Professor explores rainforest for cures

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

The battle against AIDS, malaria, leukemia and other diseases threatening humans all over the globe has found active allies here at the University.

Linda Nolan, an assistant professor in the School of Public Health, and one of her students is searching for potential cures for the deadly diseases using the vast resources of the world's rainforests.

"The incredible resources have been largely untapped," said Nolan, who teaches Public Health 160. "We're involved in a revolution."

Nolan says 80 percent of the world's population still uses traditional medicine [from nature] for disease treatment. But only about one percent has actually been tested for medicinal use, she said.

She hopes in the future more pharmaceutical companies will realize the benefits of the rainforests and fund research.

Bob Wallace, a zoology professor at the University of Florida in Gainesville and author of many science textbooks, introduced Nolan to the ongoing research using natural resources of the rainforest. The two met at a science conference in Washington last summer.

Wallace has made a lifestyle out of studying native tribes near the Amazon river and their medicinal wonders. Ethnopharmacology is a growing science which studies indigenous cultures and what they utilize from nature to medically treat tribe members.

Since 1983, he has made more than seven trips to Ecuador and Peru. With the help of native "witch doctors," he collects plants, leaves, bark, herbs, roots and sap. He sends samples he collects to Nolan to analyze.

Senior Public Health major Adrienne Brandley is doing the lab work on the samples sent by Wallace. She puts the samples through a process which turns them into liquid, and then several more processes which yield a concentrated, crude extract.

"I'm fortunate to be involved in something this important," said Brandley. "I didn't realize how big this really is until I met and talked with professor Wallace and he gave me a better understanding."

In the lab, she exposes active extracts to samples of parasitic organisms and then tests the extracts on human white blood cells to find if they are toxic to human cells. More than 120 samples have been tested so far.

"I want to see undergraduates more involved in science," said Nolan. "I want to get them into the laboratory and get them hooked."

Brandley said, "This is such an excellent opportunity for me. I can't emphasize enough how it brings my class studies to life.

"And it is fun. It's not just another long day in the lab — I am learning something new every day," she added.

Nolan said, "Hopefully our findings will uncover something beneficial that can be grown to provide an economic base for the people.

"There are beneficial things that have been found out there, and that should prod us into looking for even more," she added.

Nolan may be traveling with Wallace to Ecuador this August or December during the dry seasons to continue research. She said the Hearst Foundation has been expressing interest in doing a one-hour documentary on the trip and subsequent lab studies.

Black-Jewish Relations Committee formed

By JEREMY BORENSTEIN
Collegian Correspondent

The Black-Jewish Relations Committee was formed this semester in an effort to "build a cooperative and positive communication between Blacks and Jews," said committee chairman Steve Sparling.

Although the committee is a new one, the idea of creating a Black-Jewish coalition is not.

When Louis Farrakhan, minister and messenger of the Nation of Islam, delivered a speech at the University of Massachusetts in February 1989, his appearance and other tensions led Jewish and Black independent activists to create a Black-Jewish coalition.

Alisha Meshenberg, co-president of the coalition in the 1989-90 school year remembers those first days of great energy and accomplishment.

"Twenty people [turned out] at regular meetings every week," said Meshenberg, there was a "balanced representation." The groups efforts climaxed in a multi-cultural Passover Seder in which the Lesbian, Bisexual and Gay Alliance, AHORA, Nommo News and the Asian American Student Association participated.

But the coalition was "a crisis oriented group," Meshenberg said, and efforts to establish the coalition as a Registered Student Organization never materialized. Because of "apathy and a lack of crisis [after Farrakhan]" the coalition broke up by the fall of 1990.

The new committee in some ways parallels the old coalition and in other ways is very different. Both were established initially to relieve Black-Jewish tensions on campus, but each adopting different long range goals.

The coalition was crisis oriented and hoped to be an independent organization, said Sparling. The new committee is not and does not wish to become independent. The committee is aligned with Hillel and wants to forge a relationship with other RSO's. It is also adopting policies not based solely on crisis to give the group purpose when there are none, Sparling said.

Sparling, who was not a member of the former coalition, became interested in forging unity between the African American and Jewish communities in September when at Yom Kippur services, Rabbi Saul Perlmutter of Hillel suggested that a student organization be established for improving Black-Jewish relations.

Sparling spearheaded the effort by organizing Jewish students to "reaffirm the purpose of the group for Jews in its context of Black-Jewish relations" to find out "what it was the Jewish community needed from this group."

"The first major obstacle was approaching the Black community," Sparling said. When the committee approached the ALANA honor society with a proposal to open a discussion on improving Black-Jewish relations last semester, ALANA agreed to co-sponsor a joint celebration of Hanukkah and Kwanza.

Sparling said he was "pleased with the turnout" of about 30 students. The event was "a step in the right direction," he said, and it "helped to establish what we were and to reach out."

The committee's primary goal is "not to build an RSO, but to build positive relations between existing groups," Sparling said.

Currently, the committee has a core of five students who meet weekly.

The committee is "moving away from being crisis-oriented," said Tara Gorvine, an active member of the committee. She added that she'd like to see the two minorities build a friendly relationship, not one which is "politically oriented, so before something negative happens, we're not starting from scratch, [rather] there is a point of understanding."

One problem the committee faces is "keeping its momentum," Sparling said. "It is difficult to keep people energized and focused when the group avoids political discussions, but focuses on friendship building. It is political discussions which attract people to the issues of Blacks and Jews."

"We don't know what other communities are looking for so we could use their input," Gorvine said, adding that "ideally the group should be one of mixed culture, but

Dealing with oppression

Discussion concentrates on racism

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Correspondent

Students and faculty were laughing to the point of hysterics as a lesbian theater group performed a skit dealing with issues of oppression. The March 11 presentation produced by the Lesbian PreOccupied Theater explored the relationships between women in groups.

The skit opens up with the women arguing among one another about what topics they should explore. The group used indecisiveness to show that there are so many topics facing women that one cannot be put above another.

Greta Rensenbrink, Suzanne LaGrande, Liz Resenbrink, Chaia Helter, and Helen McElwain, all of whom are either students or graduates of UMass, discussed the issues of racism, sexism and homophobia.

The presentation was part of the Women's Studies Brown Bag lunch series and included a talk on the origins of feminist theater by Joyce Berkman, a University of Massachusetts history professor. The program ended with a discussion among the participants which centered on the problems of racism.

"You don't realize that there is racism until you are affected by it," said Chaia Helter, a participant in the skit.

"Its easier to shrug it off and say I don't have the emotional ability to deal with this," said another student.

"I think we don't want to look at racism because that makes us look at ourselves. It forces us to feel guilt, instead we should Sinking state support strangling higher ed.

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

Steep declines in state aid may force at least 28 states to increase tuition this year, according to an annual state budget survey.

Conducted by the American Association of State Colleges and Universities, the survey found that 19 states have absorbed state higher education budget slashes in fiscal year 1992.

The states which have not reported cuts declared they are expecting budget cuts in the remainder of 1992.

The report found that some state college and university systems have been especially hurt by cuts.

Some states which are reporting "below average or poor economic health" include all of New England, plus 11 other states: New York, Maryland, Georgia, Virginia, Alabama, Louisiana, Illinois, Kansas, Nebraska, California and Washington.

To deal with the lowest enrollment level in 20 years, the University of Massachusetts has raised tuition by four percent.

"I regret that it was necessary to request an increase because our long-look at the institutions that cause racism," said an audience member.

"The process of talking about racism is realizing that racism exists," a student in the audience stated.

Joyce Berkman said feminist theater really caught on in the early sixties and it has continued to grow, especially in the Valley where there are numerous theater productions.

range intent is to roll back the combination of tuition and fees," said Chancellor Richard O'Brien after the Higher Education Coordinating Council approved the tuition hike more than a week ago.

But by this fall, O'Brien said, the University will be able to meet 100 percent of the financial need of students who apply on time for grants, loans and work study.

"To achieve this objective, we have increased the campus contribution for financial aid from about $1.2 million in 1989 to $6.5 million for next year," O'Brien said.

Keith Geiger, president of the National Education Association, wrote in the Higher Education Advocate that he believes current trends in higher education will hurt poor and middle-income students.

"For many of these students, public colleges and universities have been the only affordable alternative," Geiger said.

According to the National Education Association, the federal government paid 10 percent of the nation's education tab in 1980. This year, that number has been halved.

In other developments, the Senate has passed a reauthorization of the Higher Education Act which will expand college financial aid programs for middle-income and poor families and increase funding for graduate fellowships and teacher education programs.

Estimates say an additional 600,000 students could become eligible under the new bill which was passed by a vote of 93-1.

Although the heated debate about multiculturalism on campus appears to have settled down for the moment, a study found that more than one-half of colleges and universities surveyed are offering "some sort of multicultural curriculum."

Conducted by the American Association of Higher Education, the survey found that one-third of the schools use general studies requirements as a vehicle for offering multicultural classes.

The study also found that 6 percent of the schools offer gay and lesbian studies.

realistically we need to create a strong base before we can attract other people."

"It's a slow process and we want to move quickly," Sparling said. "The group needs people who are committed to developing something that may not fully actualize itself until after they leave college."

The committee is organizing a number of co-sponsored events for later in the semester. The university's third multicultural Seder will incorporate Black history into the story of Passover. In addition, the committee is organizing an event week to coincide with the 24th anniversary of the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., "for education within the Jewish community," Sparling said. The week's events will focus on the Civil Rights movement and on modern day African American struggles.

"We're both minorities which are thoroughly oppressed," Sparling said. "We shouldn't be each other's enemies."

Besides greater publicity, Sparling said the committee "needs whatever the Black community can offer at this time. We need the Black community to keep an open mind and to respond, not to be afraid to take chances with us."

The committee meets Tuesday evenings from 7 to 7:30 p.m. in the Hillel House Lounge.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions on this page are those of the individual writer or cartoonist, and do not necessarily represent the views of the Collegian or the University unless otherwise noted.

Our politicians betray us once more

On Friday, March 13, the Higher Education Coordinating Council (HECC) voted to raise our tuition by four percent. Other universities, notably Rutgers and CCNY, have exploded under similar circumstances, while UMass students sit idly by for the fourth year in a row.

Most of the major media ignored the meeting and many of the media outlets that did attend arrived late, resulting in nonexistent or meaningless coverage. What actually transpired was sickening.

Council members, especially the chair, Piedad Robertson (who is also the Secretary of Education) displayed unbelievable arrogance and disregard for students. On the morning before the meeting, Ms. Robertson quietly called several students who were scheduled to speak, informing them that in the interest of time they would not be allowed. Furthermore, she berated the standing room only audience for clapping after testimony argued the increase. She threatened that applause time would be deducted from the total time allotted to testimony. The final insult was the way in which members of the council ignored speakers (students and members of the council) who spoke against the increase. These members either stared at the ceiling or talked amongst themselves.

It quickly became apparent that the council had no interest in even pretending to be concerned with the students. Painfully aware of this glaring display of callousness, Vice-chair Richard Wiley attempted to maintain the ruse that the HECC was truly concerned about the plight of students. He made two long (identical) speeches about how the council is not "insensitive to students" and that it unanimously voted to support a 10.8 per cent increase in state appropriations to higher education. Wiley apparently believes that raising his hand and saying "aye" was sufficient energy to expend to improve UMass. He did say, however, that if called to do so, he would testify before the Legislature. Wiley seems to feel worthy of martyr status.

After the vote, Ms. Robertson's deputy assistant, Peter Chisholm, was sent outside to diffuse the angry students. Functioning as her mouthpiece, he said that a four percent tuition increase was reasonable. However, if the University raises fees to an "exorbitant" level (due to the Legislature reducing appropriations because of the four percent tuition increase) we should give him a call.

We told him that tuition and fees were already exorbitant. To test how out of touch this bureaucrat was, a graduate student asked him to guess how much a graduate student credit cost. Peter bureaucrat guessed $150. When told that the sum was over $300, bureaucrat just shrugged his shoulders and promptly changed the subject.

Peter Wagner

Four percent is not a big increase if the base is small and hasn't increased recently. Tuition and fees have risen 15.4 per cent in the last four years. The desk jockeys at the top have continued to vote for increase after increase without looking at the math or who they are affecting. It doesn't matter to them how many students could not afford to come back this semester or how low enrollment falls. They don't seem to care that four years ago, the average UMass student's family income was $20,000; now it is over $50,000.

We need to hold our leaders accountable for their actions. For the last several years, the Trustees and the Regents (the precursor to HECC) promised with each increase that they would no longer balance the budget on the backs of students. Last year, after passing a 28 per cent increase, they put extra emphasis on their disingenuous promise.

Our elected and appointed officials need to be shown the human faces of their decisions. We need to rock Boston's boat before it sails over us. Mary Lou Anderson, a UMass graduate student and an administrator at Assumption College, voted for the increase simply because she did not want to disagree with the Trustees. (She used to sit on the Board of Regents, where she received a tuition waiver for herself and her family. It is unclear if this privilege is extended to HECC members.) Even the most progressive council members have yet to show any sign that they are willing to do more than attend HECC meetings. I wonder how many members of the council have written or called Gov. Weld about their 10.8 per cent increase, or have started to lobby the Legislature.

UMass is reserved for rich kids due to tuition increase. Screw the poor!

With love from your friends on the Higher Education Coordinating Council

Recently Approved Road Sign

We need to make our voices heard. Loudly. We cannot sit quietly while UMass is privatized. If our education officials refuse to speak up for UMass, then we must do their job for them. We must lobby for UMass directly, and we must lobby to get these clowns moving — either towards action or towards retirement.

The HECC meeting was a disturbing glimpse into a private University of Massachusetts. Students at CCNY and Rutgers strongly retaliated against budget cuts, the likes of which pale in comparison to the absolute thrashing UMass is taking now. If we, as students, do nothing about it, then nothing is what will get done.

S.G.A.'s incestuous inner circle not interested in helping students

Appearances can be deceiving. If you thought the S.G.A. was a "Get-Along-Gang" with alleged student activist Bob Monaghan as Speaker, you have been deceived.

Bob Monaghan's convenient interpretation of parliamentary procedure and Senate rules glossed over verified allegations of wrongdoing in the most recent S.G.A. run election.

This manipulative Speaker along with "unbiased" accomplices swept these allegations under the political rug. This occured both immediately after the election and during the Senate's March 25 meeting.

Monaghan spearheaded an effort to discredit a motion to table the ratification of the election until these assertions could be looked into further.

Also at this meeting, Monaghan established that when he meant that he was for Jen Wood and Newnan, he meant by any means necessary.

This political maneuvering may serve to discredit the institution of student government to the Board of Trustees, who are now considering recognizing the S.G.A.

We as Senators cannot stand to witness such arrogance against allegations of this severity.

This incestuous inner circle of the S.G.A. earns over $20,000 a year.

Are they interested in sacrificing for students or making a buck?

Thank you Tsongas for a class act

A class act of the Democratic presidential field called it quits yesterday," wrote the Wall Street Journal, as Paul Tsongas brought his presidential bid to an abrupt halt, "pleading lack of money." But for years to come and for our future presidential campaigns to endure, Mr. Tsongas had already set a standard of excellence in campaigning for all presidential aspirants.

Both Democrats and Republicans alike can spare a moment from negative advertising and take notes on the positive values Mr. Tsongas adorned in his campaign trail — tradition, property and the family. Everybody, politicians and pundits, wrote him off, but people in New Hampshire and Maryland wrote him in as a politician, unafraid to take a stand. Tsongas talk was straight talk — telling the public what he intends to do in a plain, truthful manner.

His quintessential message to the people — Americans must look at their values and attempt to change themselves in order to change the nation.

Paul Tsongas' platform was a political blend of conservative means to achieve liberal ends. He equated his non-support for middle-class income tax cut, proposed by democrat Bill Clinton, as an act of morality. Since it would plunge the nation into further recession. Also, he supported capital gains tax, meaning more corporate investment in America and less jobs overseas.

In controversial issues and the current one, abortion, Mr. Tsongas, by wearing a "choice" button regardless of the constituencies on his campaign stops, demonstrated the fact that he is nothing like Bush and other politicians who change their views on issues like abortion to attain elected position.

Finally, Mr. Tsongas is out of the political race. Who cares! He is moral miles ahead of Bush-Quayle treachery, Clintonian decadence and Brownian inconsistency. In closing, I have only four words for Mr. Tsongas: Thank you very much.

Give us a chance and you'll see what we can do

In an ideal society, public education's purpose is to give people who cannot afford private education a chance to receive a college diploma. That's all — a chance. Unfortunately, Massachusetts is far from an ideal society.

Instead, we have seen our tuition increase and our support from the state government decrease over the last five to eight years, with the situation reaching the critical level in the last two years.

Michael Morrissey

See, Massachusetts in general has some [expletive] idea that people should be left alone and go their own separate ways. The concept of community is truly foreign. Our state and local governments refuse to support the education of the young for good reason: they don't care about us.

And why should they, after all? The politicos on Beacon Hill were schooled at Harvard via Phillips Academy. They are the upper crust, and in their minds the middle class can't compete with their sons and daughters, so UMass doesn't even get a chance.

You know, it is kind of tedious to whine and bitch about how UMass has such a bum deal and how nobody loves us and how dumb and poor we are, so enough about that.

Switching to basketball, let me say that this year's Minutemen are a collection of rag-tag overacheivers who have absolutely no shot of advancing to the next level of basketball. UMass' talent level is poor compared to almost every other team in the NCAA Sweet Sixteen.

Will Herndon, Jim McCoy, and Anton Brown have chances to play overseas or maybe in the CBA, but not in NBA. It is safe to say that the big time schools, the schools that have money for recruiting and a storied tradition for the most part didn't want anything to do with our players. At UMass, they were given a chance.

John Calipari's situation was the same. Calipari, who as a player was once described as having "no speed and no shot", was lucky enough to assist top notch coaches Larry Brown and Paul Evans and learn the ropes of coaching. Still, no one ever expected at age 28 to give him a head coaching job. UMass gave Calipari a chance.

Still, for the past four years, the Boston media has given UMass basketball almost zero coverage, and the Boston-area schools didn't give us a chance to play them. UConn stopped our traditional matchup with them because they didn't want to give us the chance to beat them.

This year, everything has changed for the basketball program. Calipari is regarded as a veritable wizard, with Boston comparing him to Alexander the Great. It's nice to know that Boston has jumped on the UMass bandwagon after years of neglecting us.

Last night's game against Kentucky was the biggest game in the history of UMass, and most never expected the team to win. That isn't what's important, though.

What's important is that we had a chance. We had a chance for the past two weeks to show what our basketball team can do. Most people said the team wasn't even deserving of the No. 3 seed we had in the NCAA tourney, but we've proven them wrong.

See, although I want the team to beat Kentucky (and Duke) so badly, it's not important that we win, only that we have a chance.

Weird, isn't it? That's all our school wants. A chance. That's all our students want. That's all the basketball team wanted. Look what we can do when we're given a fair chance.

U.S. representative to retire

Michael Kennedy may run for seat with his uncle

BOSTON (AP) — U.S. Rep. Brian Donnelly's surprise decision to retire from Congress may propel another Kennedy onto the Massachusetts political scene.

Michael Kennedy, 34, of Cohasset has told The Patriot Ledger of Quincy he has discussed running for the 11th District House seat with his uncle, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

He did not disclose their advice, except to comment: "My family's legacy in this state is definately a positive factor for me."

The Kennedy name, however, has not scared away potential candidates for Donnelly's seat. More than a dozen politicians, including Secretary of State Michael Connolly, said they are considering bids.

Michael Kennedy, a graduate of Harvard University and the University of Virginia Law School, directs Citizens Energy Corp., a non-profit company started by his brother Joe to provide home heating oil to poor people. He is the 6th of 10 children born to Ethel and the late Robert F. Kennedy.

Michael Kennedy moved to Cohasset in the summer of 1991. And although it is just outside the 11th District, there's no requirement that a candidate for Congress live in the district he wants to represent.

Connolly, 44, who said he expects he would not step down as secretary of state if he runs, said he expects to move into the district when he makes the final decision. He now lives in Roslindale, only a precinct away from the Boston boundary of the 11th district.

"I am seriously looking at running," Connolly said. "I was up until the wee hours (Tuesday) night talking to people in Milton, Quincy, Weymouth, Abington, Brockton. I was back at it this morning."

The scramble began Tuesday with Donnelly's announcement that he would not seek re-election because he wants to spend more time with his family.

State Sen. Paul D. Harold, D-Quincy, was the first at the starting line. He began immediately collecting nomination signatures to get on the September primary ballot.

William Delahunt, the Democratic district attorney of Norfolk County, said he's "90 percent there. I don't want to make a decision without a lot of reflection and though. But the fire's in the belly."

Quincy Mayor James Sheets, also a Democrat, said he would announce his decision Friday.

"My family said to go for it," he said. "Before we got married, I told my wife my one dream is to become a congressman."

Sheets, who is in his second term as mayor, ran unsuccessfully for Congress against Donnelly in 1978.

Former Quincy Mayor Francis X. McCauley, a Republican, said whether he runs could depend on financial support from the state and national GOP committees.

"You don't just jump in," McCauley, chairman of the State Retirement Board, said. "Keeping your options open is a smart move for any politician to do. The dust has to settle and they have to think about their future."

Another republican, State Sen. Edward Kirby of Whitman, took a similar posture.

Mr. Lupo reviews this week's crop of movies

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Meeting Venus: Glenn Close (Hamlet) turns in another brilliant performance in a decidedly low-key, high-brow tale of love and chaos surrounding a European production of the opera Tannhauser. The film's obvious love of opera is shared by its genuine affection for its characters.

Close plays an ice-queen singing diva who falls in love with her married conductor (Niels Arestrup — who is the real star of this movie). But Arestrup must contend with a multi-lingual cast, a dissenting orchestra, tempestuous unions, backstage love affairs and an interfering management...all in the first day.

Meeting Venus successfully balances the serious love story with the backstage nonsense and frustration. Close and Arestrup emit more passion in a glance than a thousand love scenes. The supporting cast, from all over the world, are magnificently funny and memorable.

However, beyond this, there's surprisingly little to Meeting Venus. The plot is so intricately simple, its up to the actors to make the layers seem real. Despite the behind the scenes love and war melodrama, everyone makes up just in time to put on a great performance. Reminicent of those 1940's "let's put on a show!" musicals, Meeting Venus delivers an adult love story with a lofty sense of humor. It's just that I was expecting more from such acclaimed artists as Close, producer David Puttnam and director Istvan Szabo.
Grade: B

Under Suspicion: Complete with a multitude of suspects, a moody atmosphere and heaps of melodrama, Under Suspicion is an somewhat plodding but entertaining whodunnit set in 1950's Europe.

During that time, the opening screen tells us, divorces were almost impossible to get because of the strict laws. A down and out private detective (Liam Neeson) earns much needed money by setting up fake affairs for wealthy men who want a divorce. But when his wife and a renowned artist are murdered during this routine scam, not only is Neeson out looking for the killer but he's a suspect as well.

The prime suspect, however, is the artist's mistress played by the badly miscast Laura San Giacomo (sex, lies and videotape). She's embarrasingly bad as the requisite femme fatale, completely out of her league and range. They are naturally drawn together in one of the film's many predictable twists.

Under Suspicion tries to pass itself off as film noir, but everything's so surface that it just ends up looking poorly lit. Murder mystery fans probably won't be too surprised at the identity of the real killer, but it did keep me guessing. Under Suspicion is perfect for a rainy day matinee or as a Sunday afternoon renter. But it's too slow and compact to be anything more.
Grade: C+

Shadows and Fog: Black and white pretentiousness is usually reserved for rock videos but when Woody Allen resorts to it to make up for lack of substance, it's downright shameful.

Allen (whose last film was the classy yet hollow comedy Alice) lays the homages on big, nodding his hat to Fritz Lang, Bergman and it seems just about every other Expressionistic filmmaker there ever was. This is nice, but where's the plot?

Allen plays yet another nerdy character who reluctantly joins the search for a killer on the loose. And Mia Farrow plays an angelically misunderstood waif (surprise!). While there are some funny lines, the old Woody Allen wit is missing, no doubt lost in the shadows and fog.

The best thing about Shadow and Fog is sitting back and picking out the slew of actors that breeze in and out; it's like Woody's teasing us with great actors and pairing them with a stilted script. Amoung the stars one can find are John Malkovich and Madonna (she's getting better, really). Kathy Bates, Jodie Foster and Lily Tomlin play prostitutes; John Cusak peeks in as a college student.

There's pitifully nothing else to do except star-hunt while watching this nicely made but pointless, disapointing film. Woody— what were you thinking?

L.A Guns new album is a disappointment

By A.C FOSTER
Collegian Staff

For ages now, the Los Angeles club and music scene has attracted multiple rock bands seeking the big time. Consequently, Los Angeles is one of the hottest musical spots around. Thus it also attracts multiple record label scouts who can make or break the dreams for musicians. The city has been a magnet for and a producer of the hard rock and heavy metal bands who play with a "down and dirty, rock and raunch" style. They live by their golden rule of sex, drugs, and rock and roll, and preach it in their music.

A few years ago, the group L.A. Guns emerged to the top of the Los Angeles music scene, and became the latest addition to the city's list of alumni, having graduated from its club scene to major record label status. Vocalist Phil Lewis, guitarists Traci Guns and Mick Cripps, bassist Kelly Nickels, and drummer Steve Riley were signed to the prestigious label of Polygram Records (Def Leppard, Bon Jovi, Scorpions, etc.) and enjoyed considerable exposure with the release of their self-titled debut album in 1988. Like other Los Angeles based-bands, such as Motley Crue and Ratt, L.A. Guns featured a loud and aggressive guitar driven rock and roll attack, and the hard rock radio hits "No Mercy," and "One More Reason" helped effectively introduce the quintet to a hard rock audience and make them one of the newest sensations to the rock world.

In 1989, the group released the follow-up album to their successful duet. The album "Cocked And Loaded" not only maintained the momentum created by their debut album, but also expanded the group's audience and exposure substantially. The hits "Never Enough," "I Wanna Be Your Man," and "The Ballad of Jayne" found their way on to the playlists of radio stations that carried a more "mainstream" style of rock inventory, and the group was also gaining MTV exposure. L.A. Guns gained a commercial quality while maintaining their hard rock and heavy metal characteristics for the most part. A lot of this is creditable to producer Tom Werman. He has worked with groups such as Motley Crue and Kix, and knows how to help traditional sounding hard rock and heavy metal groups gain a commercial appeal. The group elevated themselves to a status where they were headlining shows at mid-sized arenas. Everything seemed to be going L.A. Guns way. They were progressing up the ladder to musical success.

During the summer of 1991, the group released their third album entitled "Hollywood Vampires." The album features a 3-D cover which ends up being somewhat symbolic of the album's music. It features a new dimension of music for L.A. Guns, and is a far cry in sound and style form their first two efforts. Tracii Guns and Mick Cripps have thrown their straight distortion sound out the window and have adopted a more melodic sound and a less aggressive style of playing. Phil Lewis seems as if he's had enough screaming for a while and sits back into a more calm style of singing, concentrating more on quality than power. They are shooting more for melodic harmony than the straight-forward raw power that helped create the "punch" to their first two albums.

Many groups have been known to change their musical direction after a time. And as groups such as Motley Crue, Aerosmith, and Metallica know, a change can often result in an incredible increase in sales and exposure. Whatever the reason for the change of direction in L.A. Guns' latest album, it is quite a change. The songs "Kiss My Love Goodbye," "Wild Obsession," and "My Koo Ka Choo" include a horn section. Mick Cripps takes up keyboards for songs such as "Crystal Eyes," and the acoustic guitar plays a larger role than ever before for the band. The album also contains three ballads, which is somewhat symbolic of the "mellowing out" that they've done.

Unfortunately, the change is not pleasing. The "calming down" of the music has made the songs boring to listen to, and as the aforementioned changed groups also know, a change in musical can also result in a change of fans, and possibly in losing the original fans as well. Sure enough, anybody who really liked L.A. Guns first two albums will most likely not enjoy the majority of "Hollywood Vampires." Shortly following the release of the album, the band was opening in concert for the likes of AC/DC. However, as a result of the average impact the album had on listeners the group is presently touring the club circuit in an attempt to further promote it. The debut single off the album, "Kiss My Love Goodbye," was released during the summer, and received some attention at first but quickly lost speed. After a substantial hiatus, the second single "It's Over Now," is presently finding radio time.

Conclusively, the album is lacking in many respects, and it is very frustrating to the following gained in their earlier days. While the album "Hollywood Vampires" is somewhat of a lemon, the group is a great rock-and-roll band at the heart nonetheless. While their latest album is the weakest link in L.A Guns musical career chain, it can be expected that this group will storm back towards the top in future days.

L.A Guns will be performing at the Vertex in Hadley on Sunday, March 29.

Bird-brained theatrics from Sweeney Todd

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

Sweeney Todd
March 25-28
Bowker Auditorium

There is a moment in the UMass Theatre Guild's production of Sweeney Todd, when the audience discovers that a sweetly singing finch has had its eyes poked out by an unscrupulous bird-seller. Though originally written as drama, this scene is now tinged with unintentional irony; for the bird seems to suffer the same affliction as the production. Both are running blind.

Theatre Review

That is not to say that Sweeney Todd is without its moments. Composer Stephen Sondheim's operatic tale of a murderous barber remains one of the greatest works of the American musical theatre. For that reason alone, even the most inadequate treatment of this show is worth a glance — and "inadequate" is exactly the word for this latest incarnation.

True, some wonderful moments exist, but they are only occasional oases in a desert of unpleasantness. Ultimately, the treatment of this play's bloodthirsty anti-hero is so uninspired that even the excellent ensemble numbers cannot save the show entirely.

The role of Sweeney Todd calls for a dynamo actor; someone who can go to extremes of rage or sorrow without relying on broad shtick effects. As played by Todd Robinson, however, Sweeney does not experience emotional change — remaining instead a rather bland constant. Robinson's Demon Barber is a crude cardboard cut-out, who is not only unfathomable, but is rather boring as well.

Part of this is undoubtedly due to director Daniel Miller's indecision about just who Sweeney is. Is he a dangerous madman? Is he an innocent victim of society? Is he just a cranky introvert? Instead of answering these questions, Miller simply tells his lead to go look menacing. The results are difficult to watch.

While Miller is not incapable of creativity, too much of this production screams his inexperience. Seemingly afraid of losing actors to backstage goblins, Miller keeps enormous numbers of people onstage at all times. This results either in awkward onstage "freezes" or in distracting shuffling noises, which come across the floor microphones more audibly than the singing.

Which is not to imply that much of the singing is not inaudible anyway. Both Todd Robinson and his tonsorial nemesis Michael Tryba have trouble with their projection, and many lines are lost beneath the orchestra, or the constant shuffling of misplaced actors. For the most part, those performers who can sing cannot act, and those who can act cannot sing.

The only exception to this rule are mirthless Judge Steven Matulewicz, and his sycophantic sidekick, Alan Schneider. Schneider is a delightfully distasteful villain, and Matulewicz's quasi-masturbatory first-act aria is one of only two scenes in the play with the charge of real emotion.

The other is a brief excursion into an asylum, which transports us to the chilling no-man's-land between insanity and madness... the land Sweeney Todd should rightfully have occupied.

There are bursts of liveliness, in the show's ensemble numbers, and a gloomily perfect set by Christina Christodoulpoulos — but they are not enough to disguise the production's basic aimlessness. This Sweeney Todd is a landed bird, which stumbles instead of soaring.

UMass student's play at Evergreen Theater

By LISA J. CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Beginning tonight at East Street Studios in Hadley, the Evergreen Theater is presenting its Spring Festival of One Act Plays.

The shows begin at 8 p.m. tonight with Down Days in Des Moines, Body Stories, The Roommate, Waiting for Lee, Have Spray Can, Will Travel.

Andrew Hermann, 22, is playwright of The Roommate. He is a University of Massachusetts graduate student, whose play will be shown tonight. It is a life or death discussion between two college roommates in their dormitory.

"The Roommate is based on the myth that if your roommate dies you get straight As and priority room assignment," explains Hermann. Hermann is a graduate from Wesleyan University where he produced his first play, The Dissolving Worm.

"The Evergreen Theater is a new community theatre. For its first project it turned over the space to local artists with technical support," says Hermann.

His show is directed by Tom Kubasik, who is a graduate of SUNY Purchase with a degree in Dramatic Literature. He has directed and acted in numerous plays, including works by Pinter, Friel, Williams, Strindberg and Wilde. The Roommate is his first area production.

The stars of The Roommate are also UMass students, Dan Geist and Joe O'Connor. Geist recently appeared in The Cherry Orchard at Mount Holyoke College. O'Connor is a member of the UMass Theatre Guild.

Evergreen Theater is an organization providing support, encouragement and training to local theater artists. The festival began as a desire to provide independent artists with an opportunity to show their work, who previously were unable to stage their theatre work due to lack of resources, finances, availability of working space or controversial subjects.

The Evergreen theatre, a barn-like structure, has a full staff and house that seats 150.

Saturday, there will be different five shows in the afternoon at 2 p.m. Later in the evening starting at 8 p.m. five more will be presented.

On Sunday, March 29 at 2 p.m. the plays include Waiting, Opposing Tension, Meeting the Sphinx, A Great Grace, and A Woman in Search of her Power. A party is included, promises the poster.

The shows are $6 per program, and $15 for a festival pass. The admission is half price for children under 12.

Correction

In yesterday's THIS WEEKEND section, the two men featured in the photo in Friday's list of events are really Dan Geist and Joe O'Connor starring in tonight's performance of The Roommate. The Collegian regrets the error.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You may have a lot on your mind early in the day. By afternoon, the inner sun of joy and confidence should burn brightly again.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Those engaged in a confidential capacity may find their work quite lucrative. Most of what you learn should not be revealed. Look forward to a rendezvous with a special person tonight.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You may not hear anything conclusive until quite late today. It will be good news. A candid conversation will do wonders for a child-parent relationship.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): When it comes to paying a bill or otherwise committing your resources, take some time to investigate. Friendship and currency do not always mix well. Discuss matters in a friendly fashion.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A discreet inquiry here and there may provide you with the missing pieces to a puzzle. Now could be the time to reveal your hand and get your point across. Go for it!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): The spotlight is on your efforts to achieve financial self-sufficiency. Tips from those your trust prove useful. Give a new partner your undivided attention this evening.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): An excellent day to tie up loose ends. Evaluate the worth of someone's advice before taking it. Say "no" to doom and gloom; you have lots of options.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Roll up your sleeves and get to work. A friendship that is real will survive the storms ahead. Plan an important upcoming event down to the last detail. Make the invitations special.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Steer clear of officialdom today. The time to push an ambitious project is almost at hand. Family reunions enjoy favorable influences this weekend. A platonic relationship heats up.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Members of your inner circle should be a special source of joy. A spirit of "one-for-all" prevails. Teamwork will help swell business profits, too.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): There is every reason to keep your hopes up. Results that have previously eluded you will soon be attained. An alliance could suffer if you try to force an issue. Play a waiting game.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A conservative approach works best when dealing with those in authority. Do not neglect the needs of your loved ones. The romantic temperature will rise tonight.

Exploring the world of professional wrestling

Alright, it's time I let the cat out of the bag . . . I went to WWF wrestling with my friends over break. Before I hear catcalls and what not, let me explain myself:

We had nothing better to do, so we decided to make the trek to Worcester to check out the latest WWF superstars. So, Scott, D.C., Jamie, Clayton, Matt, and myself jumped in our cars and made the one-hour pilgrimage.

Believe me, we didn't act normal at the Centrum, we made complete [explicative] holes of ourselves, and we had a hell of a time doing it!

When we first walked into the Centrum we immediately noticed what appeared to be a middle-aged man dressed up as Randy "The Macho Man" Savage. There was doubt in our minds, we would meet him or else we would regret it for the rest of our lives.

Scott, Clay, D.C. and myself finally mustered up enough courage to journey over to meet the Savage look-alike. We would soon find out that he was a Savage act-alike as well!

This man obviously has a sad life because he had the Macho-Man aura down-pat. After talking to him (read: making fun of him) we realized just how much of a fan (read: loser) he was.

Next up for us merry men, was a Hacksaw Jim Duggan yelling contest. We would stand up, stick up our thumbs and scream "Ho!" much like the real Duggan. Much to our surprise and delight the whole Centrum responded in kind!

Jeff Crofts

It was unbelievable to hear 8,000 (believe me that's a rough estimate) people — some more educated than others — all yelling "Ho!" at the same time. And believe me, we didn't put that puppy bed until the horse was dead.

When the actual matches started, we continued our [explicative] head ways. When the rule-breakers entered the ring, we stood up in the aisles and bowed, trying to get some sort of response from the crowd around us.

To our dismay, only youngsters were offended by our mischievous deeds.

In fact, we got in an argument with five little boys behind us, and believe you me, they all had dirty mouths. I wondered aloud if their role models were Andrew "Dice" Clay, not that that's bad or anything!

We planned on throwing superballs into the ring at the wrestlers, but unfortunately we forgot them. So we had to make do with what we had.

As the card progressed, the fans amazed us with their involvement in the matches. One teenager(clad in a Jimmy Snuka T-Shirt) really angered me when I actually saw him salute Sgt. Slaughter. I really wanted to DDT him!

Jamie did the most shameless act of all, when he constantly stood up and screamed "They hate each other!" during one particular match. All we could do was bury our heads and laugh, it really was funny.

After the card was over, Clayton did his own shameless act when he approached a closing refreshment stand which had iron bars closing in. Clayton shook the bars violently and screamed to the surprised worker "I want you in this cage!." Needless to say this was another hilarious act, it had me in tears!

On the way out, we saw another group of guys our age, with one of them chanting "Hit Man, Hit Man!" at the top of his lungs . . . guess we weren't the only ones!

Softball hosts Tourney

Maine, Army, Hofstra at Totman

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

If the weather holds off and the rain drains from Totman Field, the University of Massasachusetts softball team will open its home season this weekend hosting the UMass Tournament.

The tentative schedule is as follows: Saturday at 1 p.m. the Minutewomen will face the Maine Black Bears, who are 9-13 on the year. After that game, at about 3 p.m., UMass will face the Lady Knights of Army. Sunday at 3 p.m. they will play the Hofstra Flying Dutchwomen.

The Minutewomen are playing their first games since last week's 2-7 swing through California, where they played three of the nation's top five teams.

As Coach Elaine Sortino hit fly balls in practice yesterday that landed like bricks in the soggy grass, she said she wants her team to improve on everything from last week.

"We want to find our rhythm," she said, "and one of the things we could never establish in California was the pitchers falling into any kind of continuity or rhythm because we had lots of disruptions with the injury to Peggy Bush in the outfield, and we couldn't use Holly [Aprile] in a normal rotation."

UMass hasn't played a regional game yet this season, but is the region's No.1 seed. Hofstra is the region's No.2 seed. Maine is a team that Sortino says is "very up and down" and "explosive and unpredictable." Army carries in a 5-7 record, and as Sortino says, "they are just as the name says: disciplined, tough, fit, and physical."

Minutemen's stellar season comes to a screeching stop

high 30 points, killed UMass all night, as he did in Lexington earlier in the season when the Wildcats defeated the Minutemen 90-69.

The Minutemen had no one who could stop the "Monster Mash" as he got where he wanted — when he wanted, hitting 11 of 15 shots. He also hauled in six rebounds.

"He's a pro," said Calipari, speaking of Mashburn. "He's a lottery pick. I hope he stays at Kentucky because Rick [Pitino] will make him a better player."

"We were willing to concede Mashburn's points," said UMass forward Will Herndon, who finished his career with 15 points on 6 of 8 shooting. "We wanted to stop everyone else. But we weren't able to do that."

Kentucky's first-half lead ballooned to as much as 21 before the Minutemen began to play the kind of basketball that got them to the Sweet Sixteen.

"There were no jitters," Williams said. "We were over those in the first two games."

Jim McCoy drives the lane in the much-heralded win over Syracuse at the Centrum.

Trailing 44-24, UMass went on a 9-0 run. Lou Roe (9 points, 7 rebounds) sank four-straight foul shots, Tony Barbee nailed a trey and Brown hit a pair from the charity stripe.

Mashburn scored two buckets to build the Wildcats' lead back up to 13. From there, Barbee and McCoy hit back-to-back jumpers to bring the Minutemen within 9, as close as they had been since it was 17-10.

Seldom-used Junior Braddy scored with :38 left before intermission to put the Wildcats ahead 50-39.

McCoy then took an inbounds pass from Herndon with 1.4 seconds on the clock and let fly a three-quarter court bomb that fell through the net.

> "We were willing to concede Mashburn's points. We wanted to stop everyone else but we weren't able to do that."
> –UMass forward Will Herndon

At half-time, UMass trailed by only 8, 50-42. And considering how poorly it played for most of the first 20 minutes and the fact that the Wildcats shot a torrid 67 percent from the floor, being down only eight was a minor-miracle.

The Wildcats came out a little flat in the second-half. However, their press was causing UMass fits. Trailing 58-54, the Minutemen had several chances to cut the lead to 2, but turned the ball over instead.

With 12:26 remaining, the Minutemen finally did pull within a pair, as Roe put back his own miss.

The Wildcats ran off six unanswered-points to pull ahead 66-58 with 8:54 left to play.

John Pelphrey (18 points) then made a critical jumper that quelled UMass' momentum and gave the Wildcats breathing problem, 70-65. "We're are very excited to be in the Final 8," Pitino said. "UMass is an outstanding team that now can reflect back and smell the roses. They fought back and couldn't execute any better than we did. They kept fighting back and wouldn't quit. That's a tribute to their coaching staff and to their players."

Player of the game

Kentucky center Jamal Mashburn's 30 point night included 11 of 15 field goals, seven of nine free throws and a 3-pointer.

The 6-foot-8, 240 pound sophmore also grabbed a team-high six rebounds.

"He's the best player we played against all year," said UMass forward Will Herndon after the game. "He's a lottery pick." UMass Coach John Calipari added. "It was obvious we could not guard him."

Why Kentucky won

Depends who you ask. Calipari, diplomatically, fingered the first 13 minutes of the game, when Kentucky hit 15 of its first 20 shots — including three 3-pointers — en route to a 21-point lead.

Everyone else named referee Len Wirtz's technical call on Calipari for being out of the coach's box.

At the time, Kentucky had the ball and a 2-point lead with 4:47 to play. Kentucky out scored UMass 10-2 over the next 4:21 to put the game away.

"We were on the verge of getting back into the game. (The technical) took a lot of wind out of ourselves," said UMass guard Anton Brown. Including the technical, Kentucky hit 12 of its last 13 free throws and 18 of 23 overall.

Technical foul was key to defeat

By BRETT MORRIS
Collegian Staff

PHILADEPHIA — The game may have been won and lost within the sidelines, but it very much changed outside the coaches' lines — University of Massachusetts coach John Calapari's that is.

Because with 5:47 remaining in last night's NCAA East Regional game, with UMass building momentum on the University of Kentucky, Calipari was called for a technical foul when he stepped outside the designated "coaches" box."

At the time, the Minutemen were only trailing by four and had battled back from being down by as many as 21 in the first half.

But more importantly, Kentucky's Richie Farmer hit both free throws after the technical, followed by a Deron Feldhaus layup and an ensuing 9-2 run.

"I'm very, very embarrassed," said a dejected Calipari. "The officials have a job to do and I have a job to do. If I stepped out of the box, he has the right to call a technical.

"The timing of it made it a little tougher," he said.

UMass guard Anton Brown said, "I think it took a lot away from us because during that point we were on the verge of getting back into the game.

"I think it took a lot of wind out of our sails," he said.

The rule states that the coach must stay inside the box throughout play.

"I had no intentions of jumping outside of that box," said Calipari, who has been warned by officials before. "But, that was his option to call it."

Kentucky coach Rick Pitino, who is also known for leaving the box on occasion, said, "the referee said before the game, 'there are the lines. If you leave the lines, I'm banging you right away.' So I imagine he said the same to both teams."

The first five questions asked by the media of Calipari in the post-game interview dealt with 'the call.'

"The officals did not win or lose this game for us," pleaded Calipari. "That was just one foul out of many. It was a 2-point call just like any other.

"It was a great game. Please, don't just point to this technical."

Pitino said, "It was definitely a 2-point swing. It was an unfortunate thing but it should not diminish the game that Mashburn, Pelphrey, Woods and all these people played.

"It was a valiant comeback by Massachusetts. They had a great season. I'm disappointed that it happened, but we can't let it take away from the way the Kentucky players played, because they played great."

Continuing Education loophole cut

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

The creation of a new University policy has eliminated a costly loophole which allowed some undergraduates to unfairly avoid tuition and fees by taking courses through the Division of Continuing Education.

After an "extensive review" by the Provost's Office, the final conclusion of a report on this problem called the present system "internally inconsistent and confusing."

Beginning last year, many faculty members and deans said they were concerned with the large number of undergraduates who were completing much of their degree requirements through Continuing Education — at a "much lower" cost per credit hour.

"Clearly, the campus cannot have a 'back-door' access to regular University courses which enables some students to purchase access at a lower price than other students," said Provost Glen Gordon in a statement.

"Not only does it have financial implications for the University, but such a policy is unfair to those students who pay the full bill of attending the University as regular students," wrote Gordon.

As a result, a new policy statement was created last week. Effective starting in the Fall 1992, an undergraduate who has enrolled at UMass after being accepted into a degree program may not take Continuing Education courses except under certain circumstances.

This new policy will not effect summer or January Continuing Education sessions, University officials said.

Nancy Hellman, an undergraduate dean in the College of Engineering, said the problem is one of "inequity," saying some students are avoiding paying the regular student tuition and fees by unfairly taking advantage of such courses.

"The ones who know about it do it and the ones who don't, don't — and pay substantially more," Hellman said. "That's why I have pushed so hard to get an administrative statement."

She is most concerned with the loophole whereby senior students have been receiving approval to take several of their classes off-campus, or "in absentia."

"Absentia has allowed students to go through the Division of Continuing Education and that is illegitimate," Hellman said.

The new policy says students may not complete their senior year in this fashion except under certain circumstances.

Although Norman Aitken, associate vice chancellor for academic affairs, did not have specific data on the number of students who will be effected by the policy change, he said it's "in the 100s, not in the 1,000s."

"It's not a large problem but one that we need to deal with," Aitken said. "It only forces us to raise fees for the other students. It's unfair."

Aitken said Continuing Education serves a number of roles on campus. It offers courses for those who haven't

HOME SWEET HOME — Coach John Calipari addresses the masses in front of the Cage on Friday after the team returned from Philadelphia.

University lauds team's accomplishments

Coach John Calipari and WWLP TV 22's Rich Tettemer share a moment at the Fine Arts Cetner last night.

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

"Go! Go U! Go U Mass! Go UMass!" This is the way last night's tribute to the UMass Minutemen began, as the hoop band played the fight song to the crowd.

The crowd, reminiscent of those that assembled in the Cage all season long, took part in thanking the team for its 30-5 season.

"It's about time that UMass and the basketball team gets the regognition it deserves," said junior psychology major Julie Shatzer.

Rich Tettemer of WWLP-TV 22 was the host of the celebration, and he was quick to introduce the man behind the Minutemen, Coach John Calipari.

The crowd greeted Coach Calapari with a standing ovation, along with the typical bowing reserved for gods. He was gracious as ever, thanking everyone for coming and then addressing the season his team had.

"Don't dwell on our season, whether it was a missed shot or a missed call," said Calipari, whose comment was met by a roar from the crowd and a wise crack from Tettemer, calling the technical foul on Calipari "one of the worst calls ever!"

A segment called On The Bench With Coach Cal was then shown, depicting the coach earlier in the season against Lithuania, in which Calipari wore a microphone.

Segments that reviewed the season from Midnight Madness through the NCAA's were shown, including shots of the team's victories over New Orleans in Alaska, Iowa State at the Abdow's Classic, Oklahoma in Springfield, Temple in the Cage, and Fordham and Syracuse in Worcester.

"I expected us to have a good year," said Calipari.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien made an appearance, saying that "UMass makes a difference."

Three seniors were honored: Anton Brown, Will Herndon, and Jim McCoy. Several clips were shown of the trio, and each were greeted with a standing ovation.

In the finale, the entire 1991-92 UMass Minutemen were introduced to the enthusiastic crowd who roared as much as it did all season.

When asked of the tribute and the season, freshman Lou Roe said, "It's the best thing that has ever happened to UMass. It's been a great season."

"The tribute was not just for the basketball team, but for the University," said Calipari.

"I've been watching this team since I was 1 freshman, and I'm proud of the job they've done representing us," said junior poly-science major Ian Corcoran.

In closing, Tettemer said it best: "The season is over, but the memories are forever."

Princess Diana's father dies

By AUDREY WOODS
Associated Press

LONDON — Princess Diana's father, the 8th Earl Spencer, died Sunday of a heart attack, a hospital spokesman said. He was 68.

Diana and her husband Prince Charles, heir to the British throne, were in Austria with their two sons on a skiing vacation when the death was announced.

The couple were returning to London on Monday, and the children were to remain in Austria until later in the week, Buckingham Palace said.

The earl, who had been suffering from pneumonia, died Sunday afternoon of myocardial infarction, or a heart attack, said the spokesman for Humana Wellington Hospital in London, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The day before she left for Austria, the princess and her older son, 9-year-old Prince William, had visited the earl at the hospital. He was hospitalized March 21, but was reported to have been recovering.

The earl, born Edward John Spencer on Jan. 24, 1924, suffered a stroke in 1978, which had left him somewhat unsteady on his feet when he walked Diana down the aisle at St. Paul's Cathedral in 1981 for her marriage to Prince Charles.

In addition to 30-year-old Diana, the earl had a son Charles, Viscount Althorp, 27; and daughters Lady Sarah McCorquodale, 36, and Lady Jane Fellowes, 34.

After Diana's wedding, the earl spent much of his time at Althorp, the family seat, in Northamptonshire county north of London.

He said after the engagement, "There are times I wish she was marrying an ordinary chap, so I could have her and my son-in-law living here with me in the park," the spacious grounds of Althorp.

The earl was divorced in 1969 from the former Frances Roche, mother of his four children. He remarried in 1976, to Raine Legge, whose mother is a novelist.

AIDS patient under $20M bail

By A.J. HOSTETLER
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — An AIDS-infected man charged with paying young men for sex was ordered held on $20 million bail Sunday over fears he might try to kill himself.

Edward Savitz, 50, was arrested a second time Saturday night on seven new charges of sexually abusing two teen-age boys during the last three years. Savitz had been released the day before when his brother posted $300,000 bond, 10 percent of the $3 million bail, on the original charges.

His attorney said Sunday that Savitz denies having dangerous sex with anyone.

As of Sunday, Savitz, an executive at a company that administers health and retirement plans, faced 10 charges of sexual abuse based on the questioning of four boys, including four under age 16, who said they had contact with Savitz. According to Lt. James Mooney of the Sex Crimes Unit, two boys said they had had a relationship with Savitz for two or more years.

District Attorney Lynne Abraham sought bail of $35 million Sunday. A city court agreed to $20 million.

"They wanted to make sure he'd be off the street and be no harm to himself or anyone else," said Abraham spokesman Bill Davol.

A case of identical identity

WORCESTER (AP) — When the mailman sees the name Joseph Stapleton on the envelopes, he just dumps the whole pile in a first-floor basket rather than sorting them into the mail boxes on the wall of the three-decker.

There are four Joseph Stapletons at 24 Oberlin St. - Joe Sr., Joe Jr., Joe III and Joe IV. They range in age from 3 to 84, and at home are known as grandpa, dad, Joe and Joey.

"When somebody calls out, 'Hey Joe,' we all turn around," Joe Jr. said Saturday.

The family moved into the yellow-and-brown-frame house 21 years ago, at first taking up only the lower two of the building's three floors. Joe Sr. and his late wife, Florence, lived on the second floor, while Joe Jr., Anna and their three, then-young children moved into the first.

After Joe III grew up and married, the top floor became yet another Joseph Stapleton-headed household. After two daughters, Joe III and Gail produced Joey.

None of the Joes have a middle name.

Atkins spent $108,000 on mailing privilege

By JOHN DIAMOND
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Rep. Chester Atkins, co-sponsor of a bill banning legislative perks, was the Massachusetts delegation's leading user of franked congressional mail last year.

But an Atkins spokesman said the four-term Democrat is considering abandoning the practice.

A study by the National Taxpayers Union, a Washington-based think tank, showed Atkins spent $108,421 on free mail to constituents in 1991 while most of the 10 other House members from the Bay State were well below the $100,000 mark.

Rep. Brian Donnelly, who announced his retirement last week sent only $4,447 in franked mail last year, the second lowest figure in the entire Congress.

Spokesman Mark Provost said Atkins is considering dropping franked mail "because it's not an effective vehicle" for reaching constituents.

Because members of Congress are given different franked mail spending limits depending on the size of their districts, the taxpayers union compared House members in terms of the percentage of their allowable total that they used. On that scale, Atkins ranked in the top half among all House members, although he was far from the heaviest franked mail user.

Eleven House members actually used more than their allowable total, a practice permitted by the House so long as the member makes up the difference out of his or her office account. Atkins was 165th in the 435-member House on the scale of franked mail users.

Atkins could have sent out $183,730 according to House rules. He used 59 percent of that total.

Provost said the cost of Atkins' 800 phone number, like the franked postage, is borne by taxpayers. But constituents call when they want privilege to them," Provost said.

The 800 number has been in use in Atkins' office for more than a year, Provost said. He is the only member of the state delegation to use a toll-free number, Provost said.

Staffers at Atkins' Lowell, Mass. office handle the calls and forward questions to an appropriate aide.

Freshman Rep. John Olver (D-Mass.) who took office last June, compiled a hefty franked mail bill. Olver spent $47,626 on constituent mail, or 43 percent of his allowable total. Almost all of that was spent in the last three months of the year. If Olver maintained that spending rate over an entire year, he would have been well over his limit.

Rep. Gerry Studds, (D-Mass.) had the state's second highest franked mail bill, $100,901. But because Studds' district has a comparatively high population, he used less than half of what he was allowed.

Peace accord in limbo

Cambodia still turbulent despite treaty

By NATE THAYER
Associated Press

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia — The Vietnamese-installed government launched an army offensive against Khmer Rouge guerillas in northern Cambodia on Sunday, threatening the U.N.-sponsored peace accord that is meant to end more than a dozen years of war.

The Khmer Rouge, who are hated for the thousands of deaths they caused during a three-year reign that was ended by a Vietnamese invasion in 1978, called for an immediate truce.

The government and the Khmer Rouge have accused each other of starting the recent fighting by trying to seize more territory before full deployment of U.N. peacekeeping forces under the pact.

The government and three rival rebel groups signed the peace agreement in Paris in October. But the four-month interval before U.N. officials arrived to begin overseeing the truce left a power vacuum marked by frequent cease-fire violations, political assassinations and civil unrest.

Yasushi Akashi, head of the U.N. peacekeeping operation, said fighting was spreading, and condemned it as a threat to the peace agreement.

Once fully deployed in the biggest and most expensive U.N. peacekeeping operation ever, about 22,000 U.N. soldiers and officials are to disarm the four factions and to supervise governmental functions until elections in 1993. But officials say they will not send peacekeepers into areas where there is fighting.

"We are facing a very, very serious situation, " Prince Norodom Sihanouk, the former rebel leader who now acts as head of Cambodia's national reconciliation body, said Sunday. "There are thousands and thousands of new displaced persons who have fled their villages. The war is continuing."

The government's announcement of its offensive came on the eve of a U.N. operation to begin repatriating about 375,000 refugees from camps along the Thai-Cambodian border into the interior of a still insecure country.

The first 600 refugees are to be transported Monday from camps just inside Thailand across the frontier to western Cambodia. U.N. officials said the fighting in the north would not affect that operation, but added that truce violations were another problem facing the general repatriation effort.

Repatriation officials said other problems are the numerous land mines scattered across Cambodia.

Project Pulse
Student Affairs University of Massachusetts at Amherst

On Wednesday, October 30, 1991, Project PULSE conducted a telephone survey for the Information Data Bank (IDB), operated by the Dean of Students Office. The survey examined levels of student awareness and use of the IDB. PULSE interviewers attempted to contact 840 students selected randomly from the undergraduate student population, and 430 agreed to be interviewed. The response rate for the survey was 51%.

All of the students sampled, regardless of whether they had heard of or used the IDB, were asked which resource they use most to obtain academic information.

Next, students were asked which resource they use most to obtain non-academic information, such as information about clubs, sporting events, UVC, arts events, etc. (see Figure 2).

Finally, students were asked how the IDB could be effectively advertised (see Figure 3).

More than half (51.1%, n=217) of the students said through the Collegian.

AIDS cases rising among Mass. inmates

BOSTON (AP) — The overcrowded Massachusetts prison system is facing a rapid rise in the number of inmates with AIDS, a problem that scares both prisoners and guards.

"A lot of people here are scared to die," said Maria Luis, 30, who is serving a two-year sentence for drug possession in the state's only prison for women in Framingham. "People come in and find out they have it. It's hard to know that you are going to die in jail."

Danny O'Neil, president of the Massachusetts Correction Officers Federated Union, said, "People who take these jobs expect probably to have to take a punch once in a while. But how do you deal mentally with a situation where someone says, 'I'm going to kill you,' and bites you and you don't even know if that person has it (AIDS) or not?"

In the last five years, according to The Boston Sunday Globe, the number of prisoners who have tested positive for the virus that causes AIDS has leapt from less than 10 to 383. Those statistics reflect only voluntary testing among the more than 9,000 inmates in 20 state prisons.

If anonymous tests of incoming inmates conducted last year can be used as a projection for the future, as much as 8 1/2 percent - or more than 800 inmates - of the state prison population may soon be carrying the human immunodeficiency virus.

Among imprisoned women in Massachusetts, the percentage is higher, reflecting a population in which drug-related offenses are more common than violent ones.

"Sometime between now and 1995, you will see a real upturn in AIDS numbers, not just in prisons," said Timothy Gagnon, who coordinates AIDS information and projects for Emergency Medical Services Associates, the private firm that is running the state's prison health care system.

No studies, according to the Globe, support the premise that AIDS is being spread behind prison walls. Instead, specialists agree that most inmates, who have little or no education about AIDS, contract the disease before they are sentenced.

A proposal before the state Legislature would require all inmates to be tested for the AIDS virus, and a right-to-know bill would require that correctional officers, as well as police officers, be informed of a prisoner's HIV status.

BU's Silber not ready for V-P position

BOSTON (AP) — Boston University President John Silber turned down an offer to consider serving as independent presidential candidate H. Ross Perot's running mate, according to a published report.

The Boston Sunday Globe, quoting unnamed sources close to Silber, said an aide to the Texas billionaire telephoned Silber at his office Wednesday to make the offer.

"There was some substance to it," one source told the newspaper, who did not identify the caller, but said it appeared to be someone close to Perot.

Silber, an unsuccessful Democratic gubernatorial nominee in Massachusetts in 1990, told the Perot representative he would not abandon his own party, the sources said.

One source described Silber as being flattered by the inquiry, but as expressing no interest in pursuing the offer.

Silber attended a college reunion in Texas this weekend and could not be reached for comment. A native of Texas, Silber was a philosophy professor, and later dean, at the University of Texas in Austin from 1957 to 1970. He became BU president in 1971.

Silber's name was the second to surface as a possible

The naked truth of stripping

The ride of your life starts at the local strip joint.

Two male friends said during their weekend escapades, they ventured into a place where women take their clothes off(what little they had on in the first place) in front of men for money.

My friends openly admitted they were out trying to have a good time, but didn't want to sit at the bar alone.

Gayle Long

"Because we went to other places and they were all empty, we figured we should go and go to a place where we could at least look at women," my first friend said.

He continued to give a description of the strip joint. "You walk in and there are stools around the bar and straight ahead, there's the stage."

The stage didn't have a curtain of any sort, just two large poles situated on each side of the stage, which the women would rub up against or whatever — sounds interesting.

My other friend was excited I was writing my column about this. "YES!" he said. "Count it."

They said they didn't stay too long because the beers were too expensive, and the women were too.

While they were there they saw two women; one seemed strug-out on drugs and the other tried to come onto one of my friends — so they say.

They said although the second dancer didn't have the gyrations the other one had, she looked at my first friend and told him to "SMILE!"

What a hoot.

"And what hoot-ers," — the second friend said as he looked over my shoulder and mentioning those pasty things the drug-dancer had on her breasts.

My second friend said the first friend wanted to go to the strip joint for the great music and atmosphere. Atmosphere my [expletive].

It's a mystery why men and women alike find it necessary to look at people flashing their flesh all over the place.

Is it the forbidden fruit thing? Granted, these two aren't the Clark Gables of UMass (or the Dave guy on the Reebok commercials for that matter), but why, oh, why go to a place smelling of bad cigars and sawdust? This is one of the great mysteries of life.

Although my friends said at first the reason for going there was because they didn't want to sit at the bar alone, they also said they didn't expect to pick anyone up there.

Why then, go there?

The whole idea that night was not be 'alone,' they said. They wanted female companionship — or at least someone besides themselves to talk to.

I guess I have to laugh when men want to look at women when in actuality they want to TALK to women. It must mean men are a lot more insecure then they let on. Why else does a man do exactly the opposite of what they say they want to do?

I don't hold it against them. It's like the joke about the teenager who says to his mom he reads Playboy for the articles.

Why bother getting upset? They're going to do it anyway. If you laugh at them maybe they'll feel foolish and unmanly and maybe they'll stop going to places like that.

What's the real reason they go to those places?

I'll never know, it's like the chicken and the egg thing.

Let me know if you figure it out.

If we're divided, we won't get far

This is in response to the opinion article "Jewish alcoholics and junkies," printed on March 26. I am Jewish myself and the fact that some Jewish people have addictions of one sort or another means nothing to me. It means nothing to me in the context that anyone can have an addiction. So who cares if that person next door or even your own mother has a dependance problem of some sort? It is not going to help her to say, "Well, since you're a Catholic addict, you must go to the church's AA program." Or, "Since you're a Hindi, you can't go to the Jewish temple's installment of AA, you have to go to your own religion's AA program."

It's simple; if we divide ourselves up into specific groups because of racial and/or religious backgrounds, we are only driving ourselves farther apart. For people to be so different (religion, race, etc.), but to see each other with a common problem that they must endure through and defeat, is what will bring them closer. By dividing ourselves, we will never get far, or anywhere. We may actually push ourselves farther apart.

Back to my original topic. Are churches and temples not public buildings? Are schools not public buildings? Who cares where you got hold of your AA meeting? If people are a little concerned about going to a church AA meeting when they have never even been to a church, fine. Hold the meeting at a school. Give everyone the advantage by appointing common ground. Then, educate them so they will not be fearful out of ignorance anymore, for whatever reason they might not want to go to a church. Is it not true that hating is easier than understanding? This has proven itself many times in the past.

What you, or anyone else who has been recently educated on some topic, can do is get together with people not as up to date as you are, and make them up to date. Unity, a feeling of cooperation and the chance to work together with someone 'different' than yourself can do wonders for everyone.

The concept of putting what is right and good for the whole is what truly counts. This aim is where we should all strive, and if we do, the best can only come of it. This can be applied on any scale whatsoever. From having your family and friends not eat veal for the sake of the poor cow that is kept in a box all its life, with its only salvation being the day it gets its throat slit; to different people coming together to beat their alcohol dependance, or even at a more macroscopic level, having our own president use both his brain and conscience to see what's best for us all, and to attend the meeting at Rio this summer. We must work together. To divide ourselves is where we destroy any possible link we may have between each other.

Basketball brought joy to UMass

The accomplishments of the UMass basketball team go far beyond reaching the Sweet Sixteen. They brought joy to the town desperately in need of some.

Last semester was a busy one for myself, and I found little time to have fun. Just when I couldn't take my schedule anymore, there would be a game in the Cage. I went to seven games this season, and I walked out of each one rejuvenated and ready to get back to work. The energy that they had on the court was shared among the packed crowds and I really felt like I was a part of something big.

At a time when there is little for students to smile about, with tuition increases and budget cuts looming in the air, this season managed to bring the entire campus together. Students, faculty and administration alike all shared in the excitement and hoopla surrounding the dream season. We had something to be proud of and we showed it to the town of Amherst, the state of Massachusetts and to the country on national television.

CBS referred to us as the "Cinderella" team in the NCAA tournament, so they certainly had no contact with this campus. We knew we had something big from the start, and Coach Cal and the guys never let us down. The monumental effects of their performance have just begun. The new campus spirit of the students is just for starters. This university has received a lot of press because of the tournament and it should bring in more students to a steadily declining body. Hopefully, Governor Weld will now be forced to reckon with us and we will begin to receive the funding that we deserve. This is not to say that this alone will solve our problems, but it is a good start.

I hope that even students that don't like basketball can appreciate and respect what they have done for us. You don't even have had to ever have been to the Cage to be a part of it all. Minutemania is everywhere!

Thanks for the memories, guys.

The presidential campaign: A circus of cynical windbags?

The 1992 presidential campaign brings us another cast of characters filled with empty promises and rhetoric. Faced with the inescapable conclusion that capitalism is a dead-end street, our present one-party business system with two factions amounts to little more than a cynical circus of high financed windbags in suit coats and ties.

Voter turnout in the nation has declined steadily over the last three decades, and many voters do so only the negate whomever they consider the greater of two evils. I commonly hear criticism in the nature of "People who don't vote have no right to bitch about the system." This criticism is valid somewhat, inasmuch as it targets perceived apathy among segments of the population. Those expressing such sentiment, however, fail to address, and probably don't comprehend, that many non-voters rightly gauge the ultimate futility of casting their ballots within the confines of our present structure.

Kevin J. Smith

The political process has been severed from most people's lives and problems. Big money interests maintain rigid control of the process to include the crucial element of media coverage. The tremendous wealth and corrupting influence of these people ensure that all major candidates are merely public relations servants who will uphold the economic status quo.

By the same token, the Republican and Democratic parties have used their governmental dominance to pass restrictive and repressive ballot laws. Meanwhile, "Equal Time" requirements have been annihilated by the government and media. These undemocratic measures keep viable minority parties invisible from the vast majority of the American public.

The "Prime Time" candidates packaged and sold to us have been carefully screened to make absolutely certain they are, first and foremost, upholders of the edconomic system as is. The most pressing problem affecting our society, however — environmental destruction, unemployment, militarism and crime, for example — are economically, not politically, rooted. As such, the candidates can and will do ultimately nothing to curtail these problems.

Low voter turnout, much more than simply a matter of apathy and indifference, is one of profound alienation. While the concept of voting is an unflagging symbol of democracy ad nauseum, people have a rational reason to abstain.

I am not advocating further alienation from the political process (as if it needs my assistance anyway.) I suggest, though, that anyone who believes our government exists to help the majority of people is making a serious fundemental error. It's function, above all else, is to protect the very same people who are prolonging our societal ills in the first place.

The only thing capable of meaningful and long-lasting social change is a complete overhaul of our decrepit political system. This will require long and sometimes tedious work, a good deal of sacrifice and efforts of many citizens. The payoff, especially for future generations, is well worth the work.

Tsongas leads support for Greeks in New York

By JAMES ZOLTAK
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Although he's technically out of the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, former Sen. Paul Tsongas' appearance at a Greek Independence Day reception at a midtown hotel Sunday had the look and feel of a political rally.

Tsongas, whose name will still appear on the ballot in New York's presidential primary April 7, was grand marshal of a Greek-American parade up Fifth Avenue that followed the reception at the Pierre Hotel.

Among those joining the former senator was Mayor David N. Dinkins, City Council President Andrew Stein, Queens Borough President Claire Shulman, comptroller Liz Holtzman, Council Speaker and Majority Leader Peter Vallone, Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan, (D-N.Y.), Sen. Alfonse D'Amato, (R-N.Y.), and Rep. Bill Green, (D-N.Y.).

"It's good to be Greek," Tsongas told the banner-waving crowd.

Behind the Podium, a sign plastered with "Draft Tsongas" campaign slogans borrowed a page from another presidential hopeful, Jerry Brown, and advertised a toll-free donation number.

But despite the chants of "New York loves Tsongas," the guest of honor made no mention of his aborted campaign for the presidency and instead turned his attention to issues facing the Greek nation.

"The people of Cyprus must be free," he said. "When the president gets serious about telling Turkey it must negotiate, the Cyprus problem will be resolved."

The island nation of Cyprus, long under the Greek sphere of influence and declared independent in 1960, has been partioned since 1974 when it was invaded by Turkey following a coup by Cypriot troops.

Referring to calls for an independent Macedonian state, Tsongas said, "There is only one Macedonia."

Also in attendance was Greek Cypriot President George Vassiliou, who addressed the reception in his native tongue.

Along the route of the parade, which was sponsored by the Federation of Hellenic Societies, supporters waved Greek flags and Tsongas campaign banners in the bright afternoon sunshine.

"We have to vote only for Tsongas for president - nobody else," declared 41-year-old George Siabanis of Brooklyn.

running mate for Perot. Bert Lance, a former state Democratic chairman in Georgia, said last week that Perot apparantly also made overtures to Jesse Jackson.

Perot, a self-styled populist, has not announced he will seek the presidency. However, he said he would be willing to spend $50 million of his own money if he enters the race. Perot has said that he is waiting to see if supporters in all 50 states work independently to have his name placed on November ballots. That type of groundswell of support would probably push him into the fray.

De La Soul makes a rappin' return to SUB

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

De La Soul
Student Union Ballroom
March 29, 1992

If you read the title of the album De La Soul Is Dead and took it literally, you were dead wrong. The trio of De La Soul made a triumphant return to the Amherst area with a rockin' show last night.

Even a lengthy break between opening acts and the Soul could not undermine the success of the one-hour-plus-jam. De La Soul showed off their solid rhymes and witty sense of humors to a receptive audience.

The group began finally at about 9:45 and played songs from both of their albums, 3 Feet High and Rising and the aforementioned De La Soul Is Dead. They began the show with early tunes like "Plug Tuning" and "Potholes In My Lawn".

Lyricists Posdnuos and Trugoy then let the crowd battle it out, chant style. This part of the show showed off the innovative side of De La Soul.

Throughout the show, DJ Mase would add his two cents in; both lyrically and musically. The groups' dancers, Rena and Lulu, added energy and smiles.

De La Soul kept the show going with favorites like "Say No Go", "A Roller Skating Jam Named 'Saturdays'", "Buddy", and "I Know I Love You Better".

The concert also had a strange flashlight tribute from the group. All was dark when flashlight beams streamed across the ceiling and the Soul had the crowd mysteriously chant "Flashlight!"

After this unusual act, the group played the first single off De La Soul Is Dead, "Ring Ring Ring (Ha Ha Hey)".

The highlight of the show was the original De La hit "Me Myself And I". The group brought a couple of adorable little kids to dance along with a few shameless crowd members.

Opening up the show was the group Original Flavor. They played a four song set, and showed remarkable talent. The song "Gumdrops", about a part of the female anatomy, was especially good. Creative lyrics induced laughter from the dancing fans.

After Original Flavor, it was on to Future Sound, who could be called a poor man's Tribe Called Quest, and featured big beats. Also, group member Flashback wore what have to be considered the baggiest jeans ever.

Lupo predicts Oscars

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Despite its inordinate length, the cheesy production numbers and boring speeches, the Academy Awards is the high point of any movie lover's year. Tonight the Academy will roll out its 64th year of Oscars.

This year, since there is no Dances With Wolves or at least some comparable sentimental favorite, there may actually be some sort of suspense. With most of the races way too close to call, you may actually be surprised at who gets to walk up to the podium. To participate in this Oscar hysteria, I offer you my fearless picks and predictions: who will probably win and more importantly, who should win.

In the Best Supporting Actor race, all are deserving but the award ought to go to Harvey Keitel, who not only shined in Bugsy, but was terrific in Thelma and Louise and Mortal Thoughts. A tie for second place includes Tommy Lee Jones in JFK and Jack Palance's great turn in City Slickers. The Sorry, Not This Year Award goes to Ben Kingsley (Bugsy) and Barton Fink's Michael Lerner. The best bet is probably on Palance (he's getting old) and Keitel (he actually deserves it).

Juliette Lewis gave the most striking Supporting Performance of the year in Cape Fear. Also excellent were Mercedes Ruhel (Fisher King) and Diane Ladd (Rambling Rose). Kate Nelligan, the best thing about Prince of Tides is also nominated as is Jessica Tandy for Fried Green Tomatoes. Since Tandy won one only two years ago, the award will probably go to either Ruhel or Nelligan but Ladd may just be enough of an underdog to win.

For Best Actor, I'm torn between Warren Beatty's superb job in Bugsy or the mesmerizing Anthony Hopkins (Silence of the Lambs). Nominations were given to Robert DeNiro for Cape Fear, Nick Nolte for Prince of Tides and Robin Williams for Fisher King as well. Nolte, recently named "Sexiest Man Alive" (?) is the odds on favorite to win but certainly not deserving. DeNiro and Williams, who both gave solid performances and are Academy favorites will have plenty more chances to win. Here's hoping there will be a Silence upset or at least a Bugsy one.

Best Actress is without a doubt the toughest category. I'd cast my vote for a double Oscar to go to Thelma and Louise stars Susan Sarandon and Geena Davis, who turned in vibrant and thrilling performances. But Jodie Foster (Silence of the Lambs) and Laura Dern (Rambling Rose) were both superb and worthy; the only nominee that seems just plain out of her league is Bette Midler (For the Boys). Since the double nominees Sarandon and Davis (haven't you heard all of this before?) will probably split the vote, the race finds Foster and Dern vying for the trophy.

The Best Director competition ends up looking more like a photo finish than a race. Despite all the bad press, the Oscar should go to two-time winner Oliver Stone for his technically amazing and visually stirring JFK. Second place is reserved for John Singleton's excellent debut, Boyz N the Hood. Jonathan Demme is a close third for Silence of the Lambs with Ridley Scott (Thelma and Louise) in fourth. Barry Levinson (winner for Rain Man), no slouch himself, ends up in fifth place for Bugsy.

The Best Picture Award has more often than not gone to a great film from the year but not the 'best.' JFK, the most explosive and relevant film of the year should win. Also nominated were the superb Silence of the Lambs, Bugsy and Beauty and the Beast. The other nominee is the wishy-washy soap opera Prince of Tides. Since the controversy surrounding JFK may have robbed of the award, Bugsy just may walk off with the statuette though Silence of the Lambs could be a pleasant surprise. Beauty and the Beast, one of the best animated films of all time could pull off the trophy, but it's highly doubtful.

Odds and ends . . . Best Original Screenplay: Boyz N the Hood & Thelma and Louise. Adapted Screenplay: Silence of the Lambs. Best Song: "Belle" from Beauty and the Beast. Cinematography and Editing: JFK. Visual Effects: Terminator 2. Best Make-up: Hook.

So who will really win? The hell if I know. I make terrible predictions (sure, Tsongas in '92!). If you can stay awake through the sea of low-cut outfits, the lifetime achievement awards (which seem to take a lifetime) and the other assorted nonsense you can find out.

The 64th Academy Awards will be presented at 9 p.m. on ABC.

Motoko masters mime

My Snow White
Hampshire College
March 26, 1992

By SUE FOTI
Collegian Correspondent

Not all was lost on Thursday night. At Hampshire College's Red Barn, UMass Visiting Lecturer Motoko Maeda-Dworkin performed My Snow White to a standing room only audience.

"My Snow White" is a semi-autobiographical mime about growing into adulthood in Japan.

Motoko allows the audience to re-experience the feelings associated with growing up. The intimate and private emotions connected to a first kiss or a woman's first period are made universal to the audience. There is an immediate and powerful connection between performer and audience that is vital to the success of the performance. Motoko never breaks the connection from beginning to end.

The combination of skill, talent and ability to translate emotion to motion created entertaining and exciting imagery. Motoko puts the audience on an emotional rollercoaster. She takes you up, down, upside down and lets you off feeling exhilarated and charged up.

The art of mime has somehow developed the connotation of silly entertainment. The only mimes most students have seen are the street performers in Harvard Square that do the 'I'm trapped in this really big box and I can't get out' skit.

Motoko is amazing. She goes beyond the stereotype and produces a Broadway quality show. She seems to be able to mime the unexplainable. Could you explain the feelings you experience when you break up with your significant other without the use of words? Ponder that for a moment. Pretty cool. She is on the mark with every emotion displayed. Every situation seems magical yet realistic.

Motoko's performance has been fleshed out with the music of John Sprague. He provides the soundtrack to Motoko's mime. His use of xylophone, flute and keyboard is not overpowering and strikes a good balance with Motoko.

If Motoko performs "My Snow White" anywhere in the local area again, go see it. Her mime is better than a basketball game. Her show was a winner.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): An active day lies ahead. Be careful not to crowd your schedule too full. Your mate or partner seems more congenial. Youngsters will be happy to join you in an evening of fun.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your business associates or co-workers are eager to help out. Do not count on this cooperative mood lasting forever. A chance encounter could give you an opportunity to move in higher social circles.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Financial matters will demand much of your attention today. Cut down on daily expenses by not paying others to perform services you can do yourself. An old passion is aroused.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): New contacts and unexpected events have a telling impact on your business today. Use restraint in personal as well as professional relationships. Investigate an unsolved mystery.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): If you keep your expectations realistic, the home front will be a much happier place. Personal contentment continues to be yours. Loved ones plan a suprise.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept. 22): Weigh the pros and cons very carefully if thinking of switching your position. Diplomacy will help maintain a personal relationship with someone despite a misunderstanding.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Playing a background role now bestows certain advantages. Allow others their fair share of attention and praise. Keep your expectations high and trust your hunches.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Look forward to a busy but highly enjoyable day. Do not be dismayed at the reversal of a higher-up's decision. This will work to your advantage in the not-too-distant future.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): No difficulty is too hard to iron out if everyone is motivated by the best of intentions. Make this a fast rule. If single, you still enjoy playing the field of romance.

CAPRICORN (Dec 22-Jan. 19): Be careful not to antagonize your allies or rivals by showing your ambition too openly. Tax matters or bill collections could be a source of concern.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Be flexible. Altering your policies or methods will restore the financial balance in your favor. Time appears to be on your side. Do not shirk your responsibilities.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Do everything you can to strengthen family ties and social alliances. Affection flourishes in an atmosphere of trust and consideration. At work, your persistence pays off.

UMass cycling team finishes first at UConn

The University of Massachusetts won the team competition at the University of Connecticut bike race, held Sunday at the Storrs, Conn. campus.

It was a day of fast racing on a short, speedy and windy course, in which UMass, after entering almost 30 riders in the five collegiate categories, emerged as the clear winner.

The University of Connecticut cycling team hosted the inter-collegiate bicycle race on a 1-kilometer course in the center of the Storrs campus.

Over 200 riders competed in six categories, with races starting at 8 a.m. and ending by 1:15 p.m.

About 20 schools from around the New England area were represented at the event, which is the second weekend of collegiate racing in the spring season of the Eastern Collegiate Cycling Conference.

The season will culminate April 25-26, with the ECCC Championships, which will be hosted by last season's team winner, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, in the Boston area. The top five teams from that race will qualify for nationals, to be held May 16-17 in Rome, Ga.

UMass won the overall race title, with 763 points. Points are awarded by sprints throughout the races and by the final placings. MIT came in second, with 328 points, Central Connecticut State College was third with 184 points, UConn was fourth with 172 points, and the University of New Hampshire was fifth with 149 points.

The top men's collegiate, "A," was won in a pack sprint finish by a senior at Army/West Point, Ed Walters.

He nipped Burt Jones from UMass at the line, with Kevin Molloy from UConn coming in a close third.

The "A" race was 45 laps in length and was finished in 1:02:00.

The men rode very aggressively throughout the race, with other riders from the University of Rhode Island, Colby College, UMass, Boston University and MIT continuously on the attack.

The top women's category, "A" was won by Kirste Carlson of MIT. She made an attack a third of the way through the 30-lap race, which shattered the 11-women pack in the windy, cool conditions, and Carlson soloed on to the win about a minute up on the second place finisher, Denise Mairivell from the University of Vermont.

This is Carlson's second racing season, and under coaching by her teammate Jim Preisig (MIT), promises to be the dominant factor in ECCC racing this season.

Ben Fisher (UMass) won the men's 30-lap "B" race, Geo Snelling (Connecticut College) won the men's 20-lap "C" race, Jen Hinds (UMass) won the women's "B" race and Matt Horton (Virginia Beach), won the 10-lap open-UConn category.

gonna come out and compete," Garber said.

"I knew it was going to be a good game," he said. "I thought 'if we get up on them and get strong team play and not get the penalties. . .'I don't care who you play at this level. If you get a team that has guns out there and they can set them up with one extra man than you've got, they're going to be in the game."

Depp cut the lead to 1 at 8:28 of the third on a feed from Mike Cain, but yet another penalty cost the Gorillas soon after. SJU, sensing the opportunity for a huge upset, ran the extra-man like the textbooks say you should. Greg Sweet's only score of the afternoon put SJU ahead 7-5.

That goal woke the Gorillas up. After Schlipf scored unassisted from downtown, Millon, who had been shadowed by SJU defender Dennis McEnroe all game, followed his own shot and shoved the rebound past Tosti to tie the game at 7 and set up UMass' comeback.

in practice and was hospitalized this past week.

"Correnti usually wears his chest protector low, and the ball hit him just on the edge," coach Ted Garber explained.

"I saw him take the shot," LoPresti said. "I don't think he knew how hard he got hit or how bad he was hurt. I didn't know I was starting until the day before."

LoPresti also credits the support of the team's two senior goalies, Ray Suris and Pat Lorian.

"Ray helps me out a lot," LoPresti said. "Pat and Ray give me a lot of confidence. . . they back me totally. They're always helping me out.

"And they're not backing me up," he added. "It's up in the air who starts."

As for LoPresti's goaltending philosophy? "You've just got to go out there and play hard every day and hope when the time comes around you do the right thing.

Gorillas slip past St. John's

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

As winning ugly goes, this was mirror-breaking material.

St. John's University gave the University of Massachusetts lacrosse team a huge scare, taking a two-goal lead in the third quarter and a one-goal lead in the fourth before the Gorillas came back to claim an 11-8 win Saturday at Upper Boyden field.

The Gorillas (1-1) hurt themselves with penalties all game long before Mike Cain, Mark Millon and John Schlipf pulled the Gorillas out of the fire with some clutch passing and shooting.

"It's good to see when our backs are up against the wall this team can come through," said UMass coach Ted Garber.

SJU, which held the lead much of the game, broke a 7-7 tie on a UMass mistake. UMass goaltender Tom LoPresti's clearing pass went astray and the Redmen kept possession, resulting in Chris Johnston's second goal of the day. The score gave SJU the lead with 14 minutes to go in the game.

Cain unleashed a 30-yard rocket past SJU goalie Chris Tosti (19 saves) to tie the game at 8-8 early in the fourth quarter. The Gorillas controlled the ensuing face-off and Millon, taking the ball behind the cage, passed to a cutting Wes Depp, who put UMass up to stay with his second goal of the game.

The Gorillas got insurance goals from Millon (3 goals, 2 assists) and Schlipf (3 goals) and some unconscious saves from LoPresti (14 saves), a freshman, late in the fourth to keep SJU out of reach. The Redmen had chances to tie, but missed or were stopped by LoPresti from point-blank range.

What became a sloppy affair in cold, snowy weather didn't start that way. Schlipf converted a centering pass from Millon less than a minute into the game. Millon added a transition goal five minutes later to spot SJU a 2-0 lead. It seemed the Gorillas would win going away, as SJU looked genuinely confused in unsettled situations.

But by the midway point of the first quarter, UMass lost its composure, fell into playing St. John's slow, aggressive style of play and committed needless fouls. SJU took advantage, connecting on two extra-man situations to take a 4-3 lead in the second. Brian Bugge assisted both scores, first to Sean Rooney and then to John Salerno.

"We've got to learn from that game, as far as penalties, that you can't play the game in the penalty box," Garber said.

UMass went to halftime tied with SJU courtesy of Mario Guaglianone's second goal of the day.

The Redmen picked up where they left off and controlled most of the third quarter. They built up and protected a two-goal lead, again courtesy of some needless penalties on UMass' part. Scores from George Wichelns and Salerno (two goals, one assist) put SJU up by two, 6-4.

Had the Gorillas looked past St. John's, a team considered a weak-sister in lacrosse circles that has never beaten UMass in seven tries?

"I told our guys [St. John's] were

LoPresti saves with confidence

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Confidence is a big part of sports, but when you're a lacrosse goalie, it's a prerequisite. Just ask Tom LoPresti.

LoPresti, a freshman from West Islip N.Y., is one of four potential starting goaltenders for the University of Massachusetts lacrosse team, and was a major reason the Gorillas were able to pull out an 11-8 win over St. John's on Saturday.

While LoPresti didn't, by his own standards, have a great game — "I couldn't clear the ball, I just didn't have my cap on right," he said — his outstanding fourth quarter effort kept the Redmen off the scoreboard and kept UMass in the game. His self-confidence and aggresive play in the crease were major factors in shutting SJU down when it counted.

"I had no doubt we were going to pull it out," he said. "There was one point where I'd let up five out of eight shots and I thought to myself, 'there's no more going in. You've got to be a brick wall." Sure enough, LoPresti stonewalled St. John's in the fourth, stopping two potentially game-tying shots from point blank range in the last five minutes.

LoPresti was a high-school All-American at West Islip, where teams he started for in goal went 51-9 over three years. He was recruited by North Carolina, Towson State and Rutgers. While LoPresti hasn't declared a major yet, he is leaning towards legal studies.

LoPresti is, to put it mildly, an aggressive goaltender. On a clear against Loyola last week, he carried the ball past midfield into the Loyola zone before passing. While St. John's netminder Chris Tosti barely stepped outside the crease, LoPresti was running after ground balls behind the cage and running upfield in clearing situations. Some shudder at such risks, but for LoPresti it's just another part of his game.

"I'm definitely pretty aggressive," he said. "When the day's right and I'm out of the cage, I can handle the ball."

LoPresti's role for the Gorillas will no doubt gain importance as the team has possibly lost sophomore Rip Correnti for the season. Correnti, who looked sharp in three quarters against Loyola last Saturday, suffered a collapsed lung from a shot

Michigan, Cincinnati advance to Final Four

• Wolverines nip Ohio State 75-71

By CHUCK MELVIN
AP Sports Writer

LEXINGTON (AP) — Fab Five. Final Four. Sounds like a natural.

Michigan's precocious freshmen worked overtime Sunday, beating Big Ten nemesis Ohio State 75-71 behind 23 points and 11 rebounds from Chris Webber.

Webber sent the game into overtime with a powerful followup shot that tied it at 63 with 31 seconds left. The 15th-ranked Wolverines then dominated the extra period, outscoring Ohio State 12-4 over the first four and a half minutes before the third-ranked Buckeyes scored two meaningless baskets at the end.

Jalen Rose scored six of his 20 points in overtime, including two free throws with 32.4 seconds remaining that sealed it. Following Duke's 104-103 overtime victory over Kentucky on Saturday, it was the first time in NCAA tournament history that two regional finals have gone into overtime.

The sixth-seeded Wolverines, the lowest seed to make the Final Four since No. 6 Kansas won the national title in 1988, will play Cincinnati next weekend in Minneapolis.

It was Michigan's first win in three tries against Ohio State (26-6), and it kept alive coach Steve Fisher's dream of a second national championship in four years. Michigan (24-8) won it in 1989 after Fisher replaced Bill Frieder as head coach as the tournament began.

Ohio State's leading scorer, Jim Jackson, collected 20 points but also hurt the Buckeyes with nine turnovers.

The Fab Five, who scored all but two of Michigan's points, survived a six and a half minute-drought late in the second half during which they committed four turnovers and squandered a seven-point lead.

Neither team led by more than six until Michigan ran off eight straight points early in the second half for a 47-39 advantage. Webber started the run with a layup and finished it by passing to King for an easy layup.

Then, the Fab Five suddenly began playing like the freshmen they are. Ohio State forced four turnovers and outscored Michigan 11-0 over the next six minutes for a 61-57 lead.

The Wolverines recovered in the nick of time. Rose hit a short jumper, and Webber followed with a dunk that tied it at 61. After Jamaal Brown's 18-footer put Ohio State back up by two with one minute left in regulation, Webber powered for the followup shot on a missed jumper by Rose.

Ohio State had one last shot, but Chris Jent's jumper bounced off the rim at the buzzer.

• Cincinnati bounces Memphis State

By OWEN CANFIELD
Associated Press

KANSAS CITY — Cincinnati turned No. 4 into Final Four.

The 12th-ranked Bearcats, behind the play of Herb Jones and Nick Van Exel, beat Memphis State for the fourth time this season, 88-57, to advance to the Final Four for the first time since 1963.

Cincinnati (29-4) will play Michigan in the NCAA tournament semifinals Saturday in Minneapolis. The Bearcats beat Ohio State for the national championship in 1961 and '62.

Memphis State, like Cincinnati a member of the first-year Great Midwest Conference, ends its season 23-11.

It was the Tigers' worst loss since 1981.

The Final Four trip will be the sixth for the fourth-seeded Bearcats, who went to five straight Final Fours from 1959-63. They lost that last time in the championship game to Loyola of Chicago.

Cincinnati became the first school to register four victories over the same opponent in a single season since Kentucky swept Alabama in 1985-86.

Jones had 23 points and 13 rebounds, helping the Bearcats outrebound Memphis State by seven. Cincinnati had outrebounded the Tigers by eight per game in three previous meetings this season.

Van Exel scored 22 points and killed the Tigers with his 3-point shooting. He had one in the first half to punctuate a run that gave the Bearcats the lead for good, and added three more in the second half as Cincinnati pulled away.

The Bearcats shot 60 percent while holding Memphis State to 36 percent. In the previous three meetings, which were decided by an average of 11 points, the Tigers shot no better than 43 percent.

Anfernee Hardaway, who made just 13 of 39 shots in the first three games, scored 12 on 4-of-9 shooting. He picked up three first-half fouls and fouled out with 5:28 to play.

The Great Midwest became the first conference to send a team to the Final Four in its first year since the Sun Belt did it in 1977 with North Carolina-Charlotte.

Cincinnati looked rattled early, turning the ball over four times in the first 8 and a half minutes against the Tigers' pressure. Memphis State took a 20-17 lead at that stage, thanks to a 7-2 run.

Cincinnati settled down midway through the half and took the lead for good behind seven straight points from Van Exel, who capped the surge with a 3-pointer that made it 30-26 with 6:56 to go.

Hardaway picked up his third foul with 5:39 left in the half and guard Tony Madlock did the same a minute later.

Town passes beer keg license law

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Select Board voted unanimously last night to require residents, including University of Massachusetts, Amherst and Hampshire College students, to obtain a license to possess a beer keg within town limits.

Select Board members have been debating the "keg law" since last fall after receiving many complaints of loud parties late at night and drunks.

"The idea of the bylaw is not to be used for scouting out where all the parties will be," said Marie Wickey, administrative assistant to the Amherst town manager. "I think that the bylaw is to make people aware of liability of alcohol at parties — it's not to nail anyone."

Student leaders are outraged at the new bureaucracy and say it will not stop off-campus student parties.

"It's just going to make people jump through hoops to get there," said Jennifer Wood, president-elect for the Student Government Association, and a Amherst town meeting member.

"The town is not dealing with the real problem, because the real problem is that students are being forced into off campus parties by housing policies," said Bob Monaghan, speaker of the Student Senate.

The bylaw, which takes effect April 13, will require the license holder to be 21 years old. The processing period for the license will take four days. No fee is required to obtain a license.

Kegs are prohibited in UMass residence halls.

Although the town manager has the authority to award licenses, prospective applicants must first go to the Amherst police station for an orientation on the bylaw.

The police will consider the following factors before giving their recommendation to the town manager:

- Does the applicant have a criminal record?
- Does the applicant have a record of alcohol-related convictions, arrests or complaints?
- Is there reason to believe beer will be sold?
- What controls will be established to prevent consumption by underage persons?
- Is there a record of alcohol-related complaints under present occupancy at the site of the event?
- Is the size of the site, its parking and sanitary facilities adequate?

If a application is denied, it may be appealed to the Select Board.

The town will provide information about the keg law policies to the local liquor stores, general public and the colleges and universities for the purpose of orientations regarding the keg bylaw and policies.

"It doesn't promote a safe drinking environment, students will drink one way or another if they want," said Monaghan.

"Ultimately the responsible thing to do is for everyone to work together to create a safe environment for students, whether it involves drinking, housing issues or any other aspect of their lives here in Amherst," said Wood.

New abortion regs questioned

Explanation of guidelines fails to satisfy Democrats

By RICHARD L. VERNACI
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The official who wrote the guidelines for what can and can't be said about abortion in federally supported family planning clinics spent hours Monday trying to explain. The congressmen listening weren't satisfied.

"It's deceptive, it's a hoax and you're not playing straight with the women of this country," said Rep. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.)

Dr. William R. Archer III, a deputy assistant health secretary, was peppered with sometimes hostile questions by Democrats who wanted to pin him down on whether people who work in family planning clinics that receive federal money can counsel women on abortion.

At issue was a regulation that restricts what people in the clinics can say.

On March 20, the Department of Health and Human Services sent out guidelines that were supposed to explain how the rules governing this are to be applied. The guidance can be confusing.

In one paragraph, it says a pregnant woman at one of these clinics can be sent for medical care elsewhere that may result in "the termination of her pregnancy." In the next sentence, it says: "This referral seeks to provide a pregnant woman with the best medical management of her pregnancy and to ensure both her health and the health of her unborn child."

"I just think, Doctor, with one sentence, you could clear this up," Wyden said.

There was no one-sentence explanation.

Archer said the administration was not trying to restrict what a doctor could tell a patient, leaving that up to the physician's medical judgement. Whatever was said, it had to be done in person and it had to be done by a doctor.

Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) chairman of the Energy and Commerce subcommittee on health that was holding a hearing on the matter, said that part in the rule alone is enough to choke off discussion of abortion in many of the clinics.

"In most family planning clinics there aren't doctors there, and you know there aren't doctors there," Waxman said.

The administration is trying to walk a fine line between its often stated opposition to abortion and the political storm from groups that see the counseling regulation as censorship and a restriction on a woman's constitutional rights.

"What I hear coming from the administration is, 'Some of my friends are for abortion, and some of my friends are against abortion, and I am with my friends,'" said Rep. Gerry Studds (D-Mass.).

While the doctor can advise a woman on the option of abortion, he or she can't tell her precisely where to get one, according to Archer. The clinics are supposed to compile lists of where women can go for pre-natal services.

Esquire article upsets UM students

By BROOKE C. WHEELER
Collegian Staff

When senior French literature major Peter Sokolowski picked up his copy of Esquire magazine to have a relaxing read, he didn't expect to see an article about the University of Massachusetts.

Especially an article entitled "Inhuman Architecture, Bad Food, Boredom, Death by Fun and Games."

"At first I was affronted, but then I took into consideration the audience it was geared towards," said Sokolowski. "Esquire is for white male professionals, a 'men's club.' The article is meant to be entertaining to them, so they can look down their nose and say 'we never did that.' "

The article, which appears in the April issue of Esquire, focused on weekend social life in the Southwest Residential Area, "elevator surfing," and the death of UMass student Joel Mangion in the John F. Kennedy Tower.

An intoxicated Mangion was riding on top of an elevator on March 11, 1990 when he fell to his death. Mangion and another companion apparently defeated safety devices to gain access to the elevator shaft, officials said.

"The article really dumped on UMass students," said sophomore Kennedy residential assistant Shawn St. James. He said the RAs in his building will be writing a collective response to Esquire at a staff meeting tonight.

"UMass gets a lot of bad publicity as it is, but this article really distorted the truth," said junior art history major Haruko Hirose, another Kennedy RA. "They attract attention by writing negative things, because people would rather read that."

The author of the article, Paul Keegan, said he proposed a story to Esquire a few years ago about the strange, often destructive behaviors seen in college high-rise dorms. He chose UMass because of the Southwest towers and because he was

Girl dies at hands of brother age 3

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. (AP) — A three-year-old boy shot his two-year-old sister to death and authorities are considering charges against the toddler's parents under a state law requiring guns to be safely stored out of a child's reach.

Brittany Aaron Newton was shot in the head Sunday night with a .357-caliber Magnum handgun that belonged to her father, police spokeswoman Asa Higgs said Monday.

The children were at home with their mother and another child at the time, Higgs said. How the shooting occurred wasn't known, because the mother was not in the room, said Higgs.

Assistant State Attorney Angela Corey said any charges must follow a seven-day waiting period under the gun-storage law.

Doctor accused of causing patient's suicide

By ROBERT TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Paul Lozano entered Harvard Medical School as a promising student, but he became homesick and worried about making the grade.

Looking for help, he called the first name on an alphabetical list of psychiatrists. That simple step drew Lozano into a lurid affair with his doctor, who made the young man act like her infant son and drove him to suicide, his family says.

A state medical board schedule a meeting Monday to decide whether to punish the doctor, Margaret Bean-Bayog. Lozano's family also has filed suit against Bean-Bayog.

"She took his mind and completely destroyed him," said Lozano's sister, Pilar Williams, of El Paso, Texas. "This is not about sex. This is about his mind and soul. She took a brilliant man and turned him into a 3-year-old, a vegetable."

Bean-Bayog, who taught and conducted research at Harvard and served as President of the American Society for Addiciton Medicine, has disputed the charges.

"I categorically deny that I ever had any sexual relations with this patient or that I otherwise exceeded the proper bounds of psychotherapy," Bean-Bayog said in a statement released last week by her lawyer.

Lozano was 28 and three months short of being graduated from Harvard Medical School when he committed suicide in Texas on April 2, 1991.

Lozano's family claims that Bean-Bayog's termination of a sexual relationship, coupled with her "regression therapy" that had Lozano pretending to be her infant son eventually drove him to inject himself as many as 75 times with a lethal dose of cocaine.

According to court documents, the relationship between Lozano and Bean-Bayog began in 1986, and over four years, they were meeting or talking on the phone almost every day.

In June 1990, Bean-Bayog adopted a child and told Lozano "she didn't have time for him anymore, that she had a family to take care of now," Williams said.

'Run for Runaways' race to benefit shelter

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Correspondent

When 15-year-old Jimmy and his sisters, homeless with the knowledge that their father had committed suicide and their mother was dying of AIDS somewhere they did not know, stood outside Covenant House at 2:30 a.m. with all their possessions in a big garbage bag, they knew that the Covenant House would be there to help them.

There are 1 million children on the streets. Each year the Covenant House provides shelter to 28,000 of them.

In addition to giving them shelter, the Covenant House offers drug rehabilitation programs, child care and an education to get them off the streets.

The Covenant House is in 15 cities throughout North and Central America. Because the Covenant House receives 90 percent of its funds from charities, they depend on contributions to keep the centers going.

On April 11 the 13th annual Run for Runaways road race, sponsored by the Newman Student Association, will take place at Alumni Stadium track to benefit the Covenant House. The race is 10K and will begin at 9 a.m. for wheelchair participants, 9:30 a.m. for walkers, and 10 a.m. for runners. This is a registered race. In the past many runners have used it as a warm up for the Boston Marathon.

"I loved it. It was a fun time. If you like to run, do this race, seriously," said Bill Hodkinson, a sophomore history major.

"Many successful races have been run. At one time we had over 400 participants. During the best years, we have raised $11,000," said Sister Mildred Marengo, the advisor to the Newman Student Association, and a yearly walker.

"The number of kiddos participating in the race has been incredible," added Father Joseph Quigley.

Registration tables will be on the Campus Center Concourse from March 30 to April 3 and April 6 to April 10 from 9 a.m. - 4 p.m.

To register it is only $5 in advance and $7 on race day to cover the expense of the race. The money raised through sponsor sheets will be given to the Covenant House. Everyone is welcome to help.

"We need a minimum of 30 people on course day to work as water stops, timers and people to give out slices of oranges at the finish line," said Jim Gage, a sophomore history major working as co-chairperson for course committee.

"It was great. Last year we donated $8,000 to Covenant House. It is the most exciting charity event that I have done. Everybody has a great time," said Diana DiMasco, a junior geography major, also working as co-chairperson for course committee.

"We have prizes that have a wide appeal: sporting goods, food and music," said Marcella Turner, a senior economics major heading the prize committee.

Musicland and NRM Music are going to donate five compact discs, in addition to the Footlocker's gift of a $20 shirt, according to Charlie Mrosk, a sophomore legal studies major. If participants return their sponsor money prior to the race, they will receive a free T-shirt on a first come first serve basis, said Charlene Lim, a junior geology major, assisting as a registration chair person.

"We started preparing at the end of last semester. For two months we have been getting together every other week to work on the race. Its been a lot of work, but it is for a great cause. It is a lot of fun," said race co-director Christopher Davidson, a sophomore majoring in economics.

Many fraternities and sororities have been helping out with the race.

Activist says Salvadoran conflict now 'pragmatic'

By LUISA QUINTANILLA
Collegian Correspondent

The recently signed peace accord between the Salvadoran government and the guerilla forces of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front demonstrates how pragmatic both sides have become after 12 years of bloody war due to their failed war strategies, said an activist recently returned from El Salvador.

Oscar Chacon, director of Centro Presente, an organization devoted to aiding Central American refugees, told a standing-room-only audience at the Bookmill in Leverett on March 28 that the failure of the FMLN general offensive on November 1989 demonstrated the lack of support of the Salvadoran people for the armed uprising.

Chacon said, "The FMLN assumed that the majority of the population would participate in or support this offensive."

The offensive's failure convinced the FMLN that they had to look to alternative strategies in the struggle of effect changes in the socio-economic structure of El Salvador, he said.

But this offensive also demonstrated "that the government couldn't defeat the rebels, in spite of 10 years of military support and $6 billion in aid by the U.S. government," Chacon said.

He said the army response to the uprising proved they had "learned nothing" about the need to respect human rights, and demonstrated that they were "unreformable."

Chacon said in spite of the change of tactics on the part of the FMLN, they have not detached themselves from their original ideology of effecting social and economic justice.

He said the roots of the Salvadoran conflict lie on the inequibility distribution of sources and "means of production," concentrating wealth in the hands of what he referred to as "the 14 families, better known as the oligarchy."

Central to this problem is the issue of land ownership, the primary source of wealth in agricultural economies. He said if fundamental inequalities are not dealt with through a program of land reform, the peace treaty would be "derailed."

He also said in the process of earlier attempts at land reform, the government had bought vast tracts of land, but had never followed through with a major distribution program. This made the government the largest single owner of land in El Salvador.

Indeed, he went on, peasant squatters have illegally been occupying areas of idle government owned-land, which he supported.

Another problem for the success of the treaty, he said, is the perception that the army was simply nominally reassigning units scheduled to be disbanded under the treaty.

Chacon said the day after the disabling of the National Guard and the treasury police, two new forces emerged, the military and frontier police. He suggested that there is no functional difference between these groups, and that they were "the same monkey with a different tail."

He said this evidence of dissembling on the part of the working in Boston at the time.

"I was not trying to exploit UMass and the "Zoo Mass" reputation it may have," he said. "Southwest was the focus because the living situation there should be talked about.

"I didn't pull any punches. There is nothing factually inaccurate about the piece at all," Keegan said. "I was there on campus and experienced things first-hand. The objections may be stemming from unwillingness to examine certain problems on campus."

Freshman political science major Marc Rancourt said, "I was pretty mad about how UMass was portrayed. It was all bad points — it made it seem as though no one studied and everyone just partied and drank to excess."

"I think it's a very false representation," said sophomore resource economics major Meredith Kelly. "The article only represented 5,000 people on a campus of 19,000, and just skipped over every other area of campus besides Southwest."

Sophomore chemical engineering major Tom Fuller said he was particularly bothered by a section of the article that compared Southwest to an urban ghetto. Keegan refers to both ghetto and Southwest residents in the article as "restless kids stuck in high-rise towers, largely ignored, with no backyard to play in left to create their own increasingly dangerous coming-of-age rituals."

"That part of the article trivializes the fact that this is an academic institution," said Fuller. "We're not just sitting around waiting to graduate, trying to cause trouble.

"Besides, the article is focused on the experiences of two people, so that obscures the overall picture — we all look like a bunch of party animals who like to ride elevators," he said.

Keegan said, "I saw the elevator surfing phenomenon as a good metaphor to what happens when you stick kids in those horrible towers."

UM plastics research team helps to eliminate waste

By MICHELLE ROBBINS
Collegian Staff

Two University of Massachusetts scientists are cited in April's Scientific American for their "technological breakthrough research" in biodegradable plastics, which could help eliminate the massive waste problem in the world.

University polymer scientist Robert Lenz and biochemist R. Clinton Fuller said the long-term goal of the 21 members of the UMass plastics research team is to manufacture biodegradable polymers that can be used for everyday products as well as industrial and medical uses.

"Until recently our lab couldn't make enough samples of these new plastics," said Fuller, who is considered one of the world's experts on photosynthesis, the biological process by which plants use sunlight to convert carbon dioxide and water into food.

"We were only able to make kilograms of the materials, and everyone from the governor's staff to the Office of Naval Research wanted samples," he said.

The UMass biodegradable plastic research department, which has been funded by the National Science Foundation, the Office of Naval Research, Exxon, Procter and Gamble and DuPont, can now make pounds of plastic material at a time with the installation of new equipment, according to University officials.

Lenz, who is regarded as a pioneer in the field of polymer chemistry, said the plastics produced from bacteria hold great promise commercially. Europe and Japan are also doing research in this area.

Gov. William F. Weld has said to Fuller and other researchers that he is depending on their projects to help promote Massachusetts in trade missions to Europe.

"This magazine supplement will help to showcase the many innovations that Massachusetts is contributing to improve

Anti-stalking bill wins support of officials, AG

By DANIEL BEEGAN
Associated Press

BOSTON — A bill to make stalking a victim a specific crime in Massachusetts won support Monday from Attorney General Scott Harshbarger and the Legislature's women's caucus.

The measure, sponsored by Sen. James P. Jajuga (D-Methuen), a retired state police detective, is aimed at combatting domestic violence.

Most stalkers are estranged spouses, according to supporters of the bill.

"We are focusing on the obsessive, repeat offender who cannot be dealt with in any other way," Harshburger told the Legislature's Criminal Justice Committee.

The bill is aimed especially at people who violate restraining orders and continue to threaten or abuse victims.

Harshbarger said while current law already outlaws many of the elements of stalking, the act itself is a crime.

Stalking would be defined as willfully, maliciously and repeatedly following or harassing another person and making threats intended to scare the person.

Essex County District Attorney Kevin Burke also endorsed the bill as did Rep. Mary Jane Gibson (D-Belmont) testifying on behalf of the women's caucus.

Gibson said the hearings held by the women's caucus on domestic violence identified stalking as a serious problem.

Jajuga said the bill is a response to the increase in domestic violence in the state.

Burke and Jajuga also endorsed bills to toughen state laws for assault and battery on children and for child neglect.

Burke said current state law allows for removal of a neglected child from a home but does not provide for criminal penalties for care givers who starve or otherwise fail to provide for the child.

Russian officials deny nuclear leaks of experts

By CLINTON O'BRIEN
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Russian officials today sought to allay fears that the former Soviet Union's nuclear weapons, scientists or reactors pose a threat to world security.

Western experts have criticized the reactors built by the Soviet Union as poorly designed and operated. They also have voiced concern about whether Russia's economic problems might cause some nuclear experts to be lured away by nations like Libya and Iraq that are trying to develop nuclear weapons.

"The fears about nuclear secrets leaving Russia do not have any basis," a Russian Security Ministry Spokesman, Gen. Alexander Gurov, told reporters at the former KGB building in Moscow.

But Col. Mikhail Dedyukin, the security ministry's deputy chief for military affairs, acknowledged that "nobody can guarantee that scientists might go abroad illegally."

The news conference by nine officials from Russia's security forces and nuclear industry came a week after a radiation leak and emergency shutdown of a Chernobyl-style reactor at a nuclear plant near St. Petersburg.

Russian experts said the March 24 incident posed no threat to the public because little radiation was released. But

The true identity of multiculturalism

I'm in college, it's 1992, and multiculturalism is all the rage. Delight blows in like the left wind at the thought of it. NOT! Let's get real. How can we have a true appreciation of other cultures when we ignore our very own? Multiculturalism is a term which belongs in a septic tank, because for too many of those who bear this false standard believe in multiculturalism so long as it serves the one culture or group of cultures which they grant importance to, the true word should be Americanism.

Marc Randazza

Big Lie: America has no culture. I recently read an interview with Sinead O'Connor in which she expressed this very sentiment, and I can't just blame foreigners for this heinous load of excrement, because Americans themselves foster such idiotic thinking. Culture is a difficult term to pin down, but nobody can dispute the fact that symptoms of a cultural presence include music, cinema, language, customs, an attitude toward life in general. Well, I will have you know, oh snobbish ones both foreign and domestic, we do have a culture and one we should be infinitely proud of.

I challenge anyone to dispute the importance and influence of America on the worldwide cultural stage. Our music, blues, jazz, rock and roll, rap and even country/western, is everywhere and has affected nearly everyone with a heartbeat. Go ye, nearly anywhere on the planet and try to watch or listen for 10 minutes without seeing a dubbed American broadcast, hearing an American song, encountering an ad for a concrete American product. Burger King is my Buckingham Palace.

I have travelled all over the world, and from Budapest, Hungary to Izmir, Turkey I found Marlboro cigarettes, Snickers bars, Coca-Cola and Twinkies (in some incarnation or another). One might question me and ask how this seemingly ludicrous trash can be compared to Beethoven or the legacy of the Mayans. How can I compare shopping malls to the Colosseum of Rome; the wisdom of Plato, Socrates and Aristotle to Hunter S. Thompson? How can I compare Ronald McDonald and the Hamburgler to Alexander the Great or Lao-Tzu? I ask, how can you not? What gives each of these so-called superior cultures greater weight than partially hydrogenated soy bean oil? Nothing! There is no way that China's 5,000 years of culture are superior to our own 30 second ads, because a sum is always greater than it's elements, and so long as there are Chinese-Americans, we are all Confucius; so long as there are Italian-Americans, we are all Garibaldi; so long as there are African-Americans, we are all Shaka-Zulu.

Yes, our values as Americans are not pure in thought and action, but what culture is pristine? Every civilization has had it's own instruments of brutality, and this brutality has given rise to some of the greatest cultural creations in history. There can be no clearer example than the pyramids of Egypt, built upon the bones of the dead slaves, as is our own nation. Would Dostoyevsky or Solzhenitsyn have written were it not for the brutal injustices present during their respective lifetimes in Russia? Would Carlos Bulosan and Richard Wright have given us their genius here in America? The list goes on longer than Route 66. This legacy of hell on Earth is symptomatic of carbon-based organisms, and America is no more evil than the sum of its parts. That's you and I, brothers and sisters, we are the worst and the best that America has to offer, and each responsible for both ends of the spectrum.

We are, each and every one of us, a Klansman and a Freedom rider, a Black Panther and an AIDS victim. We all smoke crack and we all star in American movies. We should all feel anger because we are all diminished by bigotry and ignorance, and we should all feel proud that Apollo 11 bore the American flag.

Therefore multiculturalism should become a philosophy of Americanism. We must all keep alive the traditions, history and languages which comprise this America. Far too many Americans are ignorant of where they came from, both prior to their families' arrival on the North American continent and their immigrant history thus far, let alone that of ethnic groups which are not part of their own, direct blood lineage. We have a responsibility to learn our own ancestral languages and our own individual histories in addition to that of at least some of our own companions in the American melting pot.

We cannot forget that we have not only inherited the legacies of greatness and shame of every culture on earth, but we have also been forged from them into an alloy stronger than any ever imagined. An alloy which we can choose to smith into a sword, or into a plough.

We should recognize this fact and weep during the Star Spangled Banner, hot dog or sushi in hand. We must simultaneously love and loathe ourselves while we eat pounded yams and drink palm-wine. We must feel the warm glow of Sambuca in our innards and read Haiku. We must gorge ourselves on Pansit and know who built the railroads across this America, the beautiful. We must visit our synagogues, churches, mosques, North Ends, Chinatowns and Roxburys alike.

So I sit here, munching takeout from Panda East, sucking back an Old Milwaukee, smoking a Marlboro to the filter, listening to Luciano Pavarotti, celebrating the true meaning of multiculturalism, and that is this greatness, this America.

Speaker Dr. Margulis leaves lots unsaid

Dr. Lynn Margulis concluded her Distinguished Faculty Lecture by declaring herself the anointed spokesperson for the life-force of the planet, the bacteria. The bacteria were saying to her that they have lived billions of years before us and they will go on living if or when our species extinguishes itself.

However, Margulis neglected to mention that we are the bacteria and they speak to us through myth and poetry. These prophetic voices call us together by delivering a new moral philosophy between the sexes, that is, a new/old power relationship where the Goddess is the chief deity. This balance of power can build the biospheres which have become necessary to our survival. Without the guidance mythopoesis generates, science can only continue to be a destructive force in the galaxy. How sad it makes me feel that it would appear that Dr. Margulis, a Gaia scholar, underestimates her mythic role within the planetary movement she helped to create.

Women of Mary Lyon victims of bureaucratic indifference, injustice

Where is my money going? My daughter is getting an education. In fact, something I hadn't bargained for, she's getting the education of her life. And just what is that? It's about unfairness, inequality, injustice and indifference. I'm sorry now that I raised her to be a sensitive, caring, responsible and honest individual. With one ill-timed decision, all the ugly little truths came crashing down on the women of the fourth floor in Mary Lyon.

The decision, announced on March 9, was that next semester the fourth floor of Mary Lyon was no longer available, and that the women living there would have to look somewhere else for housing. The housing has to be picked by April 6. Now, that's just not fair — these people were in the middle of mid-terms and then off to Spring Break. So, roughly, in the two to three weeks when they return from break, they have to scramble to find similar housing — an all female floor in a co-ed building.

It's not fair that they should be faced with this time-consuming struggle at all. If the announcement on March 9 was that next year would be the last year they would have on the fourth floor in Mary Lyon, they would then have had time to investigate their options.

Do the decision makers care about the major havoc they have caused?

That's where the indifference comes in. Any time would have been bad, they say. The short notice is the bad part, not the decision! They are so far removed from the student body personality that they don't even know what reactions their decisions cause.

I am concerned about an administration that makes decisions without consideration of the impact it will have on students. Because these women are average, without disabilities, afflictions, no special needs, no causes, they are less equal than those special interest/needs groups. That is injustice.

Because my daughter and her 58 floormates were raised to be open-minded, understanding, caring and responsible, they will go wherever their role models push them. This is education. This is where my money is going.

'Thelma and Louise' is really a feminist-bashing movie

Okay. That's it. No more of this "Thelma and Louise" being labeled a feminist movie. Come on! I can't believe I paid money to see it. When I left the theatre I was so offended that people called it a feminist movie. Maybe a feminist-bashing movie. For those of you who have not seen this highly acclaimed film, it began with two women who were friends that had very different personalities. They were at a bar one night and one of the women was raped outside in the parking lot. Her friend found her and helped her by shooting the man who was raping her friend. Maybe not the best way to deal with the situation, but with the way the judicial system deals with rape cases I suppose shooting the rapist was probably one of the only ways for the women to feel that justice was served.

The first part of the movie which bothered me was that they ran away. They ran away! Yes, I suppose the woman who shot the rapist probably would have been prosecuted and found guilty, but it would have been their chance to show the world how unfairly rape cases are tried. It also would have risen the severity of the issue of rape to a national concern and they may have made a difference in how rape victims and all women are treated. I know it was only a movie, and in reality most people would have been concerned with their own welfare before they went out to save the world. It's just that this movie could have made so many excellent points, but instead as a woman it offended me.

Stacy Malone

As the film continued not only did Thelma and Louise run from the law, but they caused trouble in every state they fled to. They were either robbing stores or harassing men. That is not what feminism is about. It is not about being destructive to society in order to draw attention, nor is it out to degrade men. Feminism's goal is the advancement of women in achieving equality to that of men. The movie "Thelma and Louise" made it seem once these women were harmed by one man, then they felt they had to be superior to all men in order to stay in control of their lives. Feminism does not want to destroy men and all women are not out to be superior. Women just want to be equal and this society does not give women the equality they need or desire.

The ending of this movie was the worst. Thelma and Louise are surrounded by police cars with only a cliff ahead of them. What do they do? You got it. They drove off the cliff! Instead of dealing with their circumstance, helping other rape victims and owning up to the crimes they committed, they killed themselves. They felt so helpless in our judicial system that they thought death was a better alternative.

I know the characters had been through one of the scariest ordeals that a women can experience and they were frightened beyond belief, but I hoped that "Thelma and Louise" would have given hope to rape victims rather than telling them to kill, run away and commit suicide. That is not a feminist movie. That is an inappropriate way to deal with a serious issue — rape.

Rape victims have to understand that they are the victims and did nothing wrong. When you say no, you say no. It should not have been taken any other way than no. No one has the right to invade your body and if they do they should pay dearly for doing so. Rape victims also have to realize that there are a lot more people available to help them than to hurt them. Counselors, lawyers, doctors and friends are there to help rape victims help themselves and help communities get rid of people who commit such disgusting and violating crimes. Rape victims should use these resources to their advantage to help themselves deal with the trauma they had to endure, and make the rapists pay for their crime. For those of you who are fortunately not victims of rape you must realize that it can happen to you too.

In addition, he referred to rebel violations of treaty commitments, such as their failure to concentrate in 15 designated areas by the agreed date. But, he said this was primarily the result of government provocations, and that these violations were justified.

In spite of warnings, he also mentioned that the peace treaty has broad popular support, and "people are satisfied [with it]."

the future," said Weld in a press release.

Fuller and Lenz said at least two of the plastics discovered so far have novel properties and promising commercial possibilities.

One plastic developed is brittle and strong while the other is elastic, Fuller said.

"The brittle plastic can be used for items like disposable razors and diapers and the elastic plastic can be used for surgical gloves and even condoms," Fuller said.

Because these plastics are biodegradable there would no longer be a disposable problem, Fuller said. "The biodegradable plastics are also just as good as the chemically synthesized plastics which are not biodegradable."

"I am very excited to be teaching this brand new technology to people," he said.

Since 1985, Fuller said he and Lenz have been working together to create a biodegradable plastic.

"We met and started talking about each others work while waiting for the Lederle Graduate Research Tower's slow elevators," he said.

the event heightened concerns about safety at the nuclear plants in the former Soviet states and eastern Europe.

Gurov, whose ministry took over the former KGB's security functions inside Russia, played down reports that the economic crisis has weakened nuclear plant safety or prompted Russian experts to sell nuclear weapons or expertise abroad.

"The furor which has arisen around these problems is fully understandable," Gurov said. "But it does not agree with reality."

Stanislav Kaznovsky, head of Russia's Nuclear Power Engineering Research and Development Institute, admitted that older Soviet nuclear power plants, including the Chernobyl station that spewed radiation across Europe in 1986.

Calls by Greenpeace and other environmental groups to close the plants are "emotional" and disregard the potential effect on nations that rely on nuclear energy, Kaznovsky said.

Minutemen exemplify UMass attitude

From the start they had the deck stacked against them. It would be impossible to build a strong basketball program at the University of Massachusetts. There was no tradition, no funding, no fan support. The Minutemen a good team? Never. They might be a nice little team but nothing more could ever come out of Amherst.

From the start the University had an uphill battle to fight. Yes, Massachusetts is known for its world class universities, but not its public ones. Build a strong university 90 miles from Boston? You expect a commitment to UMass from Beacon Hill? If so, I've got a bridge in Brooklyn to sell you. UMass could be a nice little school but it can't compete with Harvard or MIT.

Dan Wetzel

When the success began, John Calipari's team was doubted. They can't be good, they are UMass. Why would any talented players go to there? Louis Roe, a top 30 recruit out of Atlantic City High, had to continually justify to just about everyone why he signed on with UMass. Lou, you must be crazy, UMass? The Minutemen? That's a good one. Why not Syracuse or Connecticut or Florida State?

When an in-state student decides to enroll at UMass, people wonder why. Were your grades not good enough to go elsewhere or are you just to poor? The student body is stuck with a stigma of inadequacy. If you actually chose the University over somewhere else, you better be prepared to back up your decision. ZooMass? Are you nuts? I can't believe you actually like it there. They have budget cuts, elevator surfing and teaching assistants on strike. The place is a joke.

With most of the region doubting their abilities, the Minutemen pressed on and kept winning. Their talent had been greatly underestimated. Harper Williams was a force inside. Tony Barbee could play in the paint and stick the outside jumper. Jim McCoy was a sweet shooter, who could create his own offense. William Herndon played about six inches taller than he was. Anton Brown was the clutchest point guard seen in these parts since Dennis Johnson retired from the Celtics. They were a grand success. UMass? Overrated. Come on, they don't play anybody. The Atlantic 10 isn't bad but it's not the Big East.

With its budget being slashed yearly by the Commonwealth, UMass just kept plugging away. Their administration may have wasted its funds and raised its fees but the undergraduates wouldn't quit. Tuition went up, financial aid went down and student morale disappeared. They worked harder so they could receive less. They worked two jobs in the summer and had to hold another during the school year. They didn't go away for Spring Break, they went uptown less and drank Knickerbocker instead of Bud. They had to save their cash for next year's tuition increase, so another assistant provost could be hired. What do you mean you have to work instead of going out? If you are that strapped for cash they'll give you some financial aid. What, no aid? You should have gone to a real school, where the library actually buys books. UMass, what a joke. It just doesn't compare to Brown or Yale.

So the team arrived in Philadelphia, with everyone waiting for them to fail, like expected. Oh, they got their media attention but there were still plenty of doubters, who wanted to see UMass fall on its face. Sure Williams' winner against Syracuse was electrifying but they were probably just lucky. They are out of their league now, this is the Sweet Sixteen and UMass doesn't belong. For the Final Eight — Minutemen need not apply.

They came out cold and Kentucky came out hot. Inside to Mashburn, Pelphrey from three. UMass looked outclassed and outmanned. They were down 21.

But they wouldn't die. That is not the UMass way.

Roe was tough inside, Barbee nailed a trey, Herndon stuffed Mashburn down low. And then with 1.4 seconds remaining in the half, McCoy threw up a 70-foot bomb which found nothing but the bottom of the net. Amherst just about exploded. They were within eight,.

Methodically they pounded down the lead. UMass had momentum and confidence back on its side. They were within a basket of tying it up. And then came the call.

The Massachusetts bench was assessed a technical foul by referee Lenny Wertz. It seems Calipari had stepped a foot or so outside the coaches box.

Tough call. Tough luck.

Out of the box? You've got to be kidding. That call hasn't been made all year. Lenny, you can't be serious. Say it ain't so Len. It's just not fair.

At UMass every time you battle back from a tuition increase or a budget cut, something else comes along. Just when we are close to getting back on our feet, some guy in a suit says, "fiscal downturns have forced a cut in funding for UMass." Or one of our so called friends from the Board of Trustees announces, "We are going to raise tuition by 11 percent and cut student services."

We just can't make it. We get close and someone nails us with an unfair shot. Professors declare no business as usual, Whitmore raises fees, the legislator cuts our funding, GEO strikes — hassles us as we try to attend class and then costs us $2 million a year. It's just not fair.

Tough calls. Tough luck.

The Minutemen came close to pulling off the come back and then got hit by an outside factor. But they will be back.

Even if Coach Cal gives us another tough call and takes the next train out of Amherst, the team won't quit and next year they will be even better. Harper is back. Ditto for Barbee. Lou Roe starting sounds good to me. Jerome Malloy can light it up. Toss in Dana Dingle and maybe even Donta Bright and UMass looks good.

They are undergraduates also and undergraduates here don't know how to quit. No matter who hits us next we will back and one day we will make it.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts spends a lot of time telling undergraduates of this University what we can't be. But as our basketball team showed us, if you don't listen, you can show them what you can be.

They will be back and even stronger. And so will we.

The Best rumor of the year

Georgia Tech guard is happy and won't transfer

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

Any rumors you may have heard about Travis Best, the starting point guard at Georgia Tech and Andre Riddick, a backup center at the University of Kentucky transferring to the University of Massachusetts are just that — rumors.

Best, who averaged 12.3 points and 5.6 assists per game this past season as a freshman for the Yellow Jackets, said yesterday he was happy at Georgia Tech and had no intentions of returning home.

As for Riddick, he too denied the rumor, saying he was happy at Kentucky.

Best, who UMass recruited heavily during his senior season at Central High School in Springfield, was apparently homesick earlier this season and there was talk he may transfer to a school in Massachusetts to be closer to friends and family.

However, the 5-11 freshman vehemently denied any such rumors yesterday saying, "I'm very happy at Georgia Tech. I have no intention of transferring anywhere.

"I was happy that UMass went to the Sweet Sixteen because I know a lot of the guys on the team," he said. "But I haven't talked to anyone about a move."

UMass assistant coach Bill Bayno admitted he had heard of the rumor concerning Best, but said, "His father wants him to stay. I would be shocked if he left."

Riddick, a 6-9 freshman from Bishop Loughlin High School in New York averaged 1.9 points in 8.3 minutes per game for the Wildcats. He visited UMass before choosing Kentucky and said he liked the campus and coaches but it came down to going to a school with a national reputation.

"I liked UMass when I visited," he said. "But right now, I'm happy here."

Riddick did say he could see himself in a UMass uniform. And with the Wildcats bringing in one of the top recruiting classes in the country, don't rule out the possibility of him some day donning the maroon.

Bright's sights set on UMass

By TAMIR LIPTON
Collegian Staff

If the basketball signing period for high school seniors were today, Donta Bright would sign on with the University of Massachusetts.

Therefore, if nothing changes within the next 16 days, when April 15 rolls around (the first day of the signing period which goes until May 15), the Minutemen will have themselves one of the premier recruits in the country. A bonafide Top 10 player.

The 6-6 forward has narrowed his choices down to two schools, UMass and Ohio State. But Bright said yesterday he is "probably coming to UMass."

"Ohio State is a real big school," Bright said. "There are something like 55,000 people there. That's just too big. I was impressed with [Ohio State coach] Randy Ayers and the entire campus, but it's a little big."

There is one hitch. Bright has not yet scored 700 on his SATs, which is required by the NCAA in order to play as a freshman. If he doesn't score 700, under Proposition 48, he would have to sit out his freshman year.

There has been talk that if he fails to score 700, he may go to prep school for a year, before coming to Amherst. However Bright was unwilling to discuss those possibilities yesterday, as he is enrolled in a pre-SAT class now and is taking the test again this Saturday.

Bright averaged over 20 points per game this past season for Dunbar High School in Baltimore, Md., to go along with 11 rebounds and 3 assists.

He said one of the things that impressed him most about UMass is how assistant coach Bill Bayno has been recruiting him all along.

"I like Coach Bayno," Bright said. "He's been recruiting me the longest out of everyone. I appreciate that. And Coach Cal is a great guy, too."

None of the coaches were willing to comment on Bright because the NCAA does not allow coaches to discuss recruits.

Bright would add quickness to a UMass lineup which is losing three starters to graduation. He's a slasher and a strong finisher on the fast break.

"I don't know how much playing time I would get," Bright said. "But I expect to work hard and get my degree."

The reason Bright didn't sign during the early signing period back in November was because his coach Carmie Pompey advised him to wait and see what other schools came along. But UMass has been there from the start and the loyalty impressed Pompey.

"We're both very fond of [UMass coach] John Calipari and Bill Bayno," Pompey said. "Donta is leaning toward UMass. He'll sign during the signing period."

Bright can play three positions, according to the scouts, small forward, power forward and shooting guard. The one knock on him is he has limited range on his jumpshot.

Disposable Heroes 'Hiphoprisy' intelligent rap

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The Disposable Heroes of Hiphoprisy
"Hypocrisy is the Greatest Luxury"
4th and Broadway Records

The first impression that one gets from seeing the promotional picture of The Disposable Heroes of Hiphoprisy is that the lead singer, Michael Franti, resembles Ice-T.

The first impression that one gets from hearing the album, "Hypocrisy is the Greatest Luxury", is that Franti sounds like Chuck D from Public Enemy.

Unfortunately, the Heroes don't quite come off as either Public Enemy or Ice-T. Normally, this wouldn't be a problem, except 4th and Broadway Records' press release described Franti as "Chuck D, only smarter."

Ouch.

In reality, the Heroes combine heavy beats with Franti's popping of knowledge in such cuts like, "Satanic Reverses", "Famous and Dandy (Like Amos N' Andy)" and the title cut.

In "Reverses," Franti writes, "The Berlin Wall comes down and the U.S. cracks down on illegal aliens, Ban the freedom of choice for those wanting abortion and enforce capital punishment."

The Heroes main discussion on the album is, as you may have guessed it, hypocrisy. Franti said in the press release that there is hypocrisy in the lives of everyone. While Europe is encouraging more and more freedom for their citizens, he says, America is allowing their citizens less and less.

On "Famous and Dandy," Franti said that fame and money corrupts black entertainers, especially rappers.

"We learn to like to be the heroes/ We learn to lie to be brand name negroes/ We learn to laugh to avoid being angry."

Franti said in the press release that he struggles with the question of leaving his young family to go on tour, adding that someday he may have to tell his grown-up son that he missed his childhood because he was "grabbing his crotch" on the stage.

Overall, "Hypocrisy is the Greatest Luxury" is an album with hard-hitting beats and intelligent lyrics. However, there isn't anything special about the rhymes, and they end up clashing with the beats.

If you're looking for intelligence, the Disposable Heroes of Hiphoprisy are for you. If you're looking for a good rap album, or the next Public Enemy for that matter, pass right on by.

Jiving it up with the creator of 'Jim's Journal'

By DAVID MASSEY
Collegian Staff

I interviewed the artist who draws "Jim's Journal" yesterday. I asked him lots of questions. He asked me to send him this article. It was fun.

As the story goes, Scott Dikkers brought some copies of his comic strip down to the Daily Cardinal at the University of Wisconsin one day in 1987. Though only one staffer really liked it, she convinced the other editors to run the strip.

In a phone interview from his home in Wisconsin, Dikkers said since then the success of "Jim's Journal" has skyrocketed.

Five years later, "Jim's Journal" is in over 40 college papers, Dikker's first self-published book, "I Went to College and It Was Okay," became a national college-market bestseller and a the strip "always tops readers polls above 'Doonesbury,' 'The Far Side,' and other perennial favorites," according to his syndicate.

Dikkers, 27, is even the editor of his own syndicate, Onion Features, which manages "Jim's Journal" and he also owns and edits his own weekly parody tabloid, Onion.

"It's the most talked about comic on this campus," said Dan Wetzel, managing editor of the Daily Collegian. "You either love it or hate it. It's really so simple it's dumb."

Wetzel has received signed petitions encouraging him to continue running the adventures of Jim, Dan, Mr. Peterson and the whole crew.

He also tells the anecdote about a UMass student who said she was applying to grad school in Wisconsin after she found out from him that the artist behind "Jim's Journal" hailed from the University of Wisconsin.

In addition, he said he is asked just about weekly if Scott Dikkers is a UMass student.

"It takes kind of everyday situations and finds humor in them," said Nikki McHugh, a student in Butterfield who initiated a petition to bring "Jim" back to the pages of the Collegian comic page.

Tom McAlpine, a sophomore history major, considers himself a big "Jim's Journal" fan. But why?

"It's humor that's so simple that it's hysterically funny," McAlpine said. "I like the whole aspect of the stick figures. That adds to the whole simplicity."

Q and A with Scott Dikkers, the man behind "Jim's Journal":

What kind of fan mail do you receive?: The book [I Went to College and It Was Okay] actually gets around a lot further than the cartoon strip does. And so I actually get a lot of fan mail about the book. You know, people in odd areas where the strip isn't running will write to me and say they saw this really neat book.

What's the weirdest type of fan mail you have ever gotten? I've gotten some pretty funny ones . . . One sent me a picture of their sorority and invited me to their party. They had already selected someone as my date. That was pretty wacky. I get a lot of people drawing their own "Jim" cartoon. It's always something violent or sexual.

How much is "Jim" a reflection of your own personality? We're pretty doggone different, actually. He never says anything. He never has an opinion on anything. He's sort of an existential guy who just observes everything.

Where do you find the inspiration for "Jim"? Well, I keep a journal myself. When you go back and read your journal from a long time ago, some of the stuff just doesn't make any sense. You wonder why you wrote down this stupid stuff. I did this and I did that, and it struck me as really funny. So I figured it would probably work well as a cartoon. But I don't use my actual journal entries. I make stuff up.

Why does "Jim" appeal to readers? The point of "Jim's Journal" was to have a cartoon strip that wasn't funny and thereby funny. Meaning, you know, the main element of humor is usually surprise. Since every other comic strip you see you know there's going to be a little zinger in that last panel, how can it be funny if you know exactly what you're going to get, exactly what to expect? I figured with "Jim," I'd make a cartoon that didn't have a zinger in the last panel, sometimes wouldn't have anything in the last panel or probably something parenthetical.

Why isn't "Jim" more emotional or opinionated? The point of "Jim" not really having any opinions or outward emotions is so that the reader can be "Jim." Part of the fun, I think or I hope, is that the reader can make whatever joke he or she wants by putting their own feelings into Jim. They can be amused by what "Jim" sees, they can be angry by what he sees, they can be sad by what he sees. I think that gives it sort of a personal dimension because it's kind of like a "make-your-own-strip."

What does the future hold in store for "Jim" and the crew? My goal is to get into a really big, daily newspaper. A guy at Universal Press Syndicate is a big fan of the strip and he really likes it but he doesn't think it's marketable. And I would agree with that. It may take some time because it's such a different sort of strip.

What's the process behind the creation of "Jim's Journal"? Well, most of the time is taken by the writing. I spend a lot of time on the writing — you probably can't tell. That's my aim of course — to make it look easy. I pick all the words so there is a nice sort of rhythm to it . . . And that's pretty much the chunk of the time, half an hour to an hour to think it up.

So it's a lot harder than it looks? Yeah, you could make it easy by whipping off some things but it wouldn't have a rhythm, it wouldn't have deeper meaning if you look for it.

He was telling me all about the hard time he was having finding a job.

Today I noticed Mr. Peterson batting something around on the floor, so I picked it up.
She backed up and got ready to pounce, as if waiting for me to throw it back to her.
I looked closely at it and it was a thin blue plastic thing with a little ridge on the end.
I couldn't imagine where it came from.

Multicultural Affairs

Two women who have succeeded at UMass

By EVELYN A. DE JESUS
Collegian Staff

Before Women's History Month was over, the Multicultural Affairs Page cannot forget those minority women we see every day on this campus. We wanted to interview many more but we had to choose. They are two minority women who work for the University, both of whom are administrators. These are Jo-Anne Vanin, vice chancellor for student affairs, and Gloria Guevara, associate dean for academic support services.

Vanin is in charge of Public Safety, Health Services, Dean of Students, Student Activities, Academic Support Services and Housing divisions in the University. These divisions include programs such as the Everywomen's Center, Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns, Disability Services, Bilingual Collegiate Program, Collegiate Communication for Education of Black and other Minority Students and the United Asia Learning Resource Center.

Vanin has a degree from Bryn Mawr College, a master's degree from Harvard and a Ph.D. from Bryn Mawr. She has been in UMass since April 1989 where she enrolled in the position of Dean of Students. She is vice chancellor since February 1989.

When she was interviewed she always had smile on her face. She is positive respecting the development of minority women on this campus.

"The University needs to continue to attract more women into the administration and management positions. . . There are excellent women of color [in UMass] but not enough in the administration and management, Vanin said, the voice of women reminds the institution on their issues."

Gloria Guevara, associate dean for academic support services.

Gloria Guevara is associate dean for Academic Support Services. She is in charge of everything that has to do with personnel matters, payroll, recruitment, hiring and evaluations. She has a degree in elementary education from the University of Puerto Rico; two masters, one in education with a concentration in guidance and counseling and the other in school administration and supervision from the University of Puerto Rico also and a Ph.D. in education research and statistics from UMass.

Gogui, as known by those who work with her, came to UMass in 1973 only to get her Ph.D., but she never though it was going to be "forever," as she says.

Guevara has been a teacher since she was 18 years. She has taught every grade from first grade to 12th, community college, through doctoral degree programs. She calls herself "teacher of teachers" because of that.

"These are the things I'm proud the most," she says.

She stared working in UMass when she was offered the position of director of the Bilingual Program in the School of Education, where she was the Department Head of Instructional Leadership. Then she was recruited by the Division of Student Affairs. "I left the School of Education but I am proud of it, that's where my heart is," she says.

When she is asked how does she should be introduced she says "a Puerto Rican woman."

"I represent my race and my people. I do my job and I believe in equality to give opportunity on education. I struggle every day to fulfill the educative opportunity. . . My people are all who have some kind of disadvantage," she says.

Multicultural Affairs Policy Editorial

There is a major concern on the part of the Multicultural Affairs Editor to have people writing for the page from every ethnic community on this campus. Now, however there is the issue of people who want to write in their native language, different from English. Also, they propose to have a translation in English next to the article.

This happened weeks ago when a senior proposed an excellent idea of writing her opinion on the situation of the Latino community on campus and what she has observed during her years in UMass. The idea is perfect. There is no doubt that she is one of the most proper persons to write about that. However, she wanted to do it half in English and half in Spanish. An agreement could not be made.

As a native Spanish speaker and member of the Latino community it was very difficult to say no to the idea. It was not fair to the rest of the communities. There are communities, such as the Chinese, which have a different alphabet, which is not available in the Collegian graphics software. If a Chinese or a Japanese student asks to write in Mandarin Chinese or Japanese respectively they could not do it because the technology is not available.

In addition, the Multicultural Affairs Page comes out very few times a semester, only every two weeks. It is not proper to use twice the space to express the same thing when there are many issues going on this campus that should be covered or criticized, such as racism.

In this situation, when someone writes in another language we are alienating the rest of the communities which cannot do it. You may think this is a multicultural page but we have to be fair with everyone — we cannot make exemptions for whims.

Of course, we have to be proud of our native language. We are not questioning that. It would be really neat to have any language printed and that our page would be printed out more often. What we are facing is that some people are confusing out of control reasons with racism and accusing the Multicultural Affairs Editor of being racist and "assimilist."

This issue is not a matter of "uniformity." It is a matter of not wasting one inch of the only opportunity, WE, the minority communities have only every two weeks on expressing in this paper on our page in everything that concern us.

A Chinese speaks on Virginity

The tragedy of Chinese women being men's private properties had lasted thousands of years under China's feudal system before the socialist regime founded in 1949. They were deprived of the most essential dignity and became reproductive machines. Women must be kept a virgin before marriage in order to ensure that the family's heritage remained in the hands of the legitimate male descendants.

Wenping Jin

The Biography of Martyr Virgins, written by Confucians, recorded and highly praised the thousands of pure, chaste women who sacrificed their lives to keep virginity in every dynasty of ancient China. They were considered martyrs, because they guarded that feudal society's order which was essential for the ruling class to keep control. But the hypocritical Confucians never praised a single chaste man.

Although the socialist regime highly improved women's status, the Confucian ideology are still lingering in every corner of the New China. Considering that few Chinese man who cannot bear to marry a wife who had sexual intercourse with any other man, the society still demand women being chaste before marriage no matter how old they are. Of course. It also helps maintain social stability and promote so called socialist values.

Rebellions are brutally punished by the authority and reprimanded by the society. I can never forget one of my best friends was expelled from college because of premarriage pregnancy two years ago. Before leaving, she came to me with her two hands shading her face and said: "I really love him, should they punish me like this? Who cares about virginity if I don't care?"

With tears in my eyes I watched her disappeared in the darkness. But I didn't have any strength to help her. She was forced to leave one of the best colleges in the country, with a life time stigma and her dream to be a female diplomat never came true!

So, who cares about virginity? the authority, the men or the society? Should we continue to live this oppressed life? In a socialist country, how come still has such backward ideology remained? Every communist in the country claimed to be a Marxist, but just few of them willing to read Engels' The Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State. The marriage between Marxism and Confucian can only give birth to a freak.

During China's 5,000 years "brilliant" civilization, there was only one women movement — the May 4 movement broken in 1919. It advocated free choice marriage and the liberation of women's deformed "lily feet." Now it is time to continue the unfurnished revolution. Let us break the "Great Wall" and rekindle the bonfire!

But first of all, let me make a suggestion to all the Chinese women who study in America: just open your minds, and accept people from all over the world. It does not matter if he is Black, White or Hispanic. If we really love or appreciate each other, who cares about virginity? There will be no more the tragedies of "Martys Virgin" and "Madam Butterfly," if we base sexuality on the equality of all human races.

HANDS presents mimic

By EVELYN A. DE JESUS
Collegian Staff

Yesterday, the University of Massachusetts HANDS, a student sign language club, and the Student Affairs Cultural Enrichment Fund presented the Robert Rivest Mime Theater.

Robert Rivest is a professional mimist which had been performing all around the world in places such as Morocco, Germany, France, Belgium, Denmark and Spain.

Actually he is a Massachusetts resident and he performs in the Pioneer Valley area, in which he is well known.

The HANDS Club is a club on campus organized with the purpose of uniting deaf and hard of hearing students of UMass with hearing students in their rights. It also supports, gives information and has available resources to the community concerining issues of deaf and hard of hearing students. It advocates the rights of the deaf and the hard of hearing in addition to teach American Sign Language to everyone who is interested on it.

Deafness varies in different ranges. Hearing impairing can be a little or big. The audiological definition of deaf if of 90 decibel loss or more. Hard of hearing is a loss of 89 decibel or less.

The cultural definition of deaf culture is when a group of deaf people deal together and share a common language, culture, politics and deafness. A common language refers to sign language and politics is when they share the same point of views of the deaf's rights.

A person can be considered deaf audiologically, but to be considered deaf culturally is a matter of the person's decision. If not it is called hard of hearing. A person can be hard of hearing but not be part of the deaf culture. To be considered part of the deaf culture a person only needs to share only two of the points expressed above.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Continue to assure a difficult young person of your affection and good intentions. Staying on your toes will help surge ahead of a competitor.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Any business mistakes made today could be not only costly but embarrassing. Certain people are very quick to pass judgement; be careful. Begin to gather income tax materials together.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Even if you have some doubts about the efficacy of your methods, you should not change them right now. They may have a delayed effect on boosting the bottom line. Wait and see.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Check to see that the books of a business are up to date. You need to know exactly how things stand. Loved ones are glad to go along with your entertainment plans.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): One thing leads to another. Those who took advantage of yesterday's fine opportunities can extract even greater benefits today. Loved ones are waiting for you to express your wishes and return stolen property.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You have all the skills and information you need to turn out superlative work and boost your financial worth. Go over business contracts with a fine-toothed comb before signing.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Spirits run high today. Constructive plans have an excellent chance of success. Make sure a collaborator shares your enthusiasm.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Aim high when setting goals and persevere until you reach them. You should be obtaining better results for your efforts. Taking an objective view helps resolve a domestic dispute.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): What you want tomorrow or in the days to come may have to be arranged for now. It is never wise to wait until the last minute. Take a chance on romance tonight.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A young relative may not realize that money does not grow on trees. The more assets you have, the better your chance of boosting your social prestige.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A brilliant idea comes from out of the blue. You know how to handle a service, health or romantic problem. Shun the limelight and go for the gold in business and investments.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Letting things slide at work would be a mistake. On the off chance that you have been misinformed, move cautiously in a delicate personnel matter. A telephone call or letter brings welcome news.

Buried Child dug up in the Curtain Theater

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Correspondent

It was a rainy day at the old house, when Shelley learned from Halie's mentally handicapped son that the body of a child had been buried in the backyard after being murdered by the grandfather of Shelley's boyfriend, whose violent uncle had gotten his leg cut off with a chainsaw.

If that doesn't sound like the average plot synopsis, it is only because Buried Child is not like the average play. Indeed, it is doubtful that anyone describing a work by the enigmatic Sam Shepard would use the word "average."

In a career spanning decades, Shepard has established himself as one of the world's most prolific and successful living dramatists — but it was never by playing things safe. This is the man, after all, who ended one of his plays by having deadly green slime consume the entire cast.

Shepard's world is like a cosmically disturbed version of the American West. It is a weirdly erotic, happily psychotic place, and stepping into it is like stepping into a whirlwind. Thoughts, visions, hopes and fears buzz around one's head like living creatures, forming a fluttering, intoxicating flurry of sensations.

The emotions can be varied and numerous, yet also simultaneous — causing a variety of reactions in the audience.

"[Buried Child] is funny," explains director Keith Oliver, "but at the same time, it's terrifying. That's one of Shepard's best qualities."

Oliver is the man at the helm of the UMass Curtain Theater production of Buried Child, which begins its two-week run tonight. With this production, he hopes to create a darker version of Shepard's classic work — acknowledging the play's universal qualities, but also examining its difficult subtext.

There is a lot going on in that subtext — including a search for identity from a forgotten son, and a primal power struggle over ownership of the family homestead. However, Oliver and his seven person ensemble are striving for a subtle, evocative staging, which addresses many concerns without becoming heavyhanded.

Ultimately, it is the text which will leave the strongest impressions.

Shepard's gift is his ability to transport you to the places you've seen only in dreams, or the places you've lived all your life.

So if you are looking for a new take on the bizarre or the familiar, cast aside your apprehensions and give Buried Child a try.

Buried Child is playing April 1-4 and 7-11 at the Curtain Theater at UMass. Tickets are available from the FAC box office and seating is limited.

Women's gym 4th at A-10 Championships

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

Ever have one of those days when even your best isn't good enough?

Such was the case this past Saturday when the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics squad scored a season high 189.4 team points at the Atlantic 10 Championships in Rhode Island but still placed fourth behind perennial favorites West Virginia [191.9], George Washington [189.75] and Temple [189.45].

"This was just a great meet for us," said UMass coach Alfie Mitchell despite his team's fourth place finish. "Everyone performed as well as could be expected and the meet was extremely close the whole way [only two points separated Nos. 1-5]. I think if we had had one less fall, we might have placed higher.

"But you can't look at it that way," said Mitchell. "We wanted to have a strong showing by having a high regional [NCAA Northeast] qualifying score and we did so I'm very happy [with the outcome]."

Leading the way for UMass was junior Tammy Marshall who performed a 9.9 in the floor exercise, a 9.8 in the vault and finished second all-around with a 38.85 mark. West Virginia's Lajuanda Moody was first in the all-around with a 39.35.

Moody was neck and neck with Marshall during the whole meet as the pair tied for first in the floor and tied for second on the vault as well.

Temple's Jennifer Kefkow captured first in the vault by scoring a 9.85.

UMass' Margaret Furtado had a great meet as she set three personal bests by scoring a 9.65 in the vault [fifth place], a 9.7 in the bars [fourth place] and a 9.65 in the floor [fifth place].

"Margaret [Furtado] works so hard in practice and it's finally paying off for her," said Mitchell.

Other strong performers for UMass were Gina Demeo, who had her best performance of the season all-around with a 37.45 [tenth place overall] and Kim Grady who also set a personal record in the bars with a 9.55 [seventh], despite the fact that she is still recovering from an early season foot injury.

As a team, the UMass gymnasts broke the school vault and bar records by scoring 47.65 and 47.80 respectively.

"We had a chance going into the meet [to win] but the three teams who beat us are very tough, especially West Virginia," said Mitchell. "We went into the meet as the fourth seed and came out as the fourth seed — I think we're all satisfied with that."

Minutewomen Notes:

Four UMass Gymnasts were named to the A-10 All-conference team.

Marshall was named to four out of five events on the team; vault [9.62 season avg.], beam [9.37], floor [9.54] and all-around [37.89].

On April 11, UMass [10-7] will travel to Penn State for the NCAA Northeast Regionals as the fifth seed.

in 1981. They were already making good money. I was angry at the NFL for striking in 1989, too. But I'm of a different opinion this time.

Hockey players take a beating. Their season is too long, career-threatening injuries are a constant danger because the NHL can't or won't stop the violence the game doesn't need and the pay isn't nearly what skilled athletes in other sports make.

Everybody else has free agency. Baseball players make ridiculous sums for swinging bats and catching flies. Football players are on the whole, well compensated for the risks they take, and skill positions can make as much as baseball pros do.

Basketball, with it's salary cap and enormous TV revenue, has the highest average salary of any team sport. Soccer stars overseas are no paupers either.

It's only fair hockey players get a slice of the sports industry pie. The NHL's leadership is asleep at the wheel and needs the wake-up call a strike would provide.

I don't want to see a strike. What I'd like to see is the NHL leadership get a clue. Sit tight, that could take a while.

And what about those Bruins? If the playoffs happen, the Bs will draw Buffalo in the first round. Some say the Bruins should fire coach Rick Bowness and bring back Mike Millbury to put some fire back into a sleepwalking Bruin squad that has been dogged by injuries all season.

I disagree. Bowness is a minor league coach not used to the Boston pressures, which demand success. Give him a chance to win a playoff series. But if they lose to Buffalo, can him.

Lacrosse moves up to 15th in latest poll

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts lacrosse team moved up a notch to No. 15 in the latest United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association poll, released yesterday.

The Gorillas (1-1) face 20th-ranked Hofstra on Saturday at Upper Boyden field. The Flying Dutchmen (2-3) moved down from No. 19 to No. 20 in the poll, which is voted on by Division I lacrosse coaches.

Elsewhere, Loyola climbed past Baltimore rival Johns Hopkins into the top slot with a 6-0 record. The Greyhounds copped all 10 first-place votes.

Johns Hopkins slipped to No. 2, while Syracuse remained at No. 3. Rounding out the top 10 are North Carolina, Princeton, Towson State, Virginia, Brown, Maryland and Navy. Brown, who the Gorillas face this Saturday in Providence, is tied with Maryland for eighth. Other UMass opponents in the USILA rankings include Yale (15) and Delawarre (2-3).

UMass goaltender Rip Correnti, who suffered a collapsed lung after taking a hard shot off the chest in practice, will soon end his stay at Cooley Dickinson Hospital. The sophomore should be back on campus today, although his return to the playing field may take a little longer.

Are You Experienced In Computer Systems?

Softball sweeps Army, hosts Hartford today

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts softball team opened its home season Sunday with a doubleheader sweep of the Army Lady Knights, 11-1 in five innings and 6-3.

In the first game the Minutewomen (5-7) jumped on Army pitcher Darlene Dondero right away, scoring five runs on four hits and an error in the first inning.

Pitcher Holly Aprile singled to start the inning, and was sacrificed to second by first baseman Rachel Lawson. After shortstop Barbara Marean doubled home Aprile, catcher Sherri Kuchinskas walked, only to be tripled home by center fielder Peggy Bush. She later scored on a double play grounder.

In the fourth, Aprile reached on an error, and was sacrificed to second by Lawson. Marean and Kuchinskas singled. After a groundout, Bush singled, and later scored on a groundout by Jenn Salisbury.

"We have a very strong hitting team," said UMass coach Elaine Sortino. "We've got some serious bats, and some are hidden in the bottom of the order."

Aprile gave up three hits while striking out one and walking four, in raising her record to 1-1 and lowering her earned run average to 3.11.

In the second game freshman pitcher Kelly Daut (2-3, 2.51) allowed only one ball out of the infield. All three runs were unearned and Daut gave up four hits while walking five and striking out 10.

UMass went up 1-0 in the second inning on a triple by Kuchinskas and a single by Angyla Brumm.

Army countered with two runs in the fourth on two hits and a walk, and another run in the fifth on two singles and an error by third baseman Laurie Dondarski.
